Switching from Victim to Creator of Your Life

ANDAVA

The Victory Mode

From Suffering
to Bliss.
From Tandava
to Andava.

A STORY OF AWAKENING. A PATH TO VICTORY.

INSPIRED BY THE WISDOM OF TAMIL TRADITION
AND THE TEACHINGS OF THE BHAGAVAD GITA

MAHAVADHANI SRI ACHARIYA ARAWINDHAN GURUG

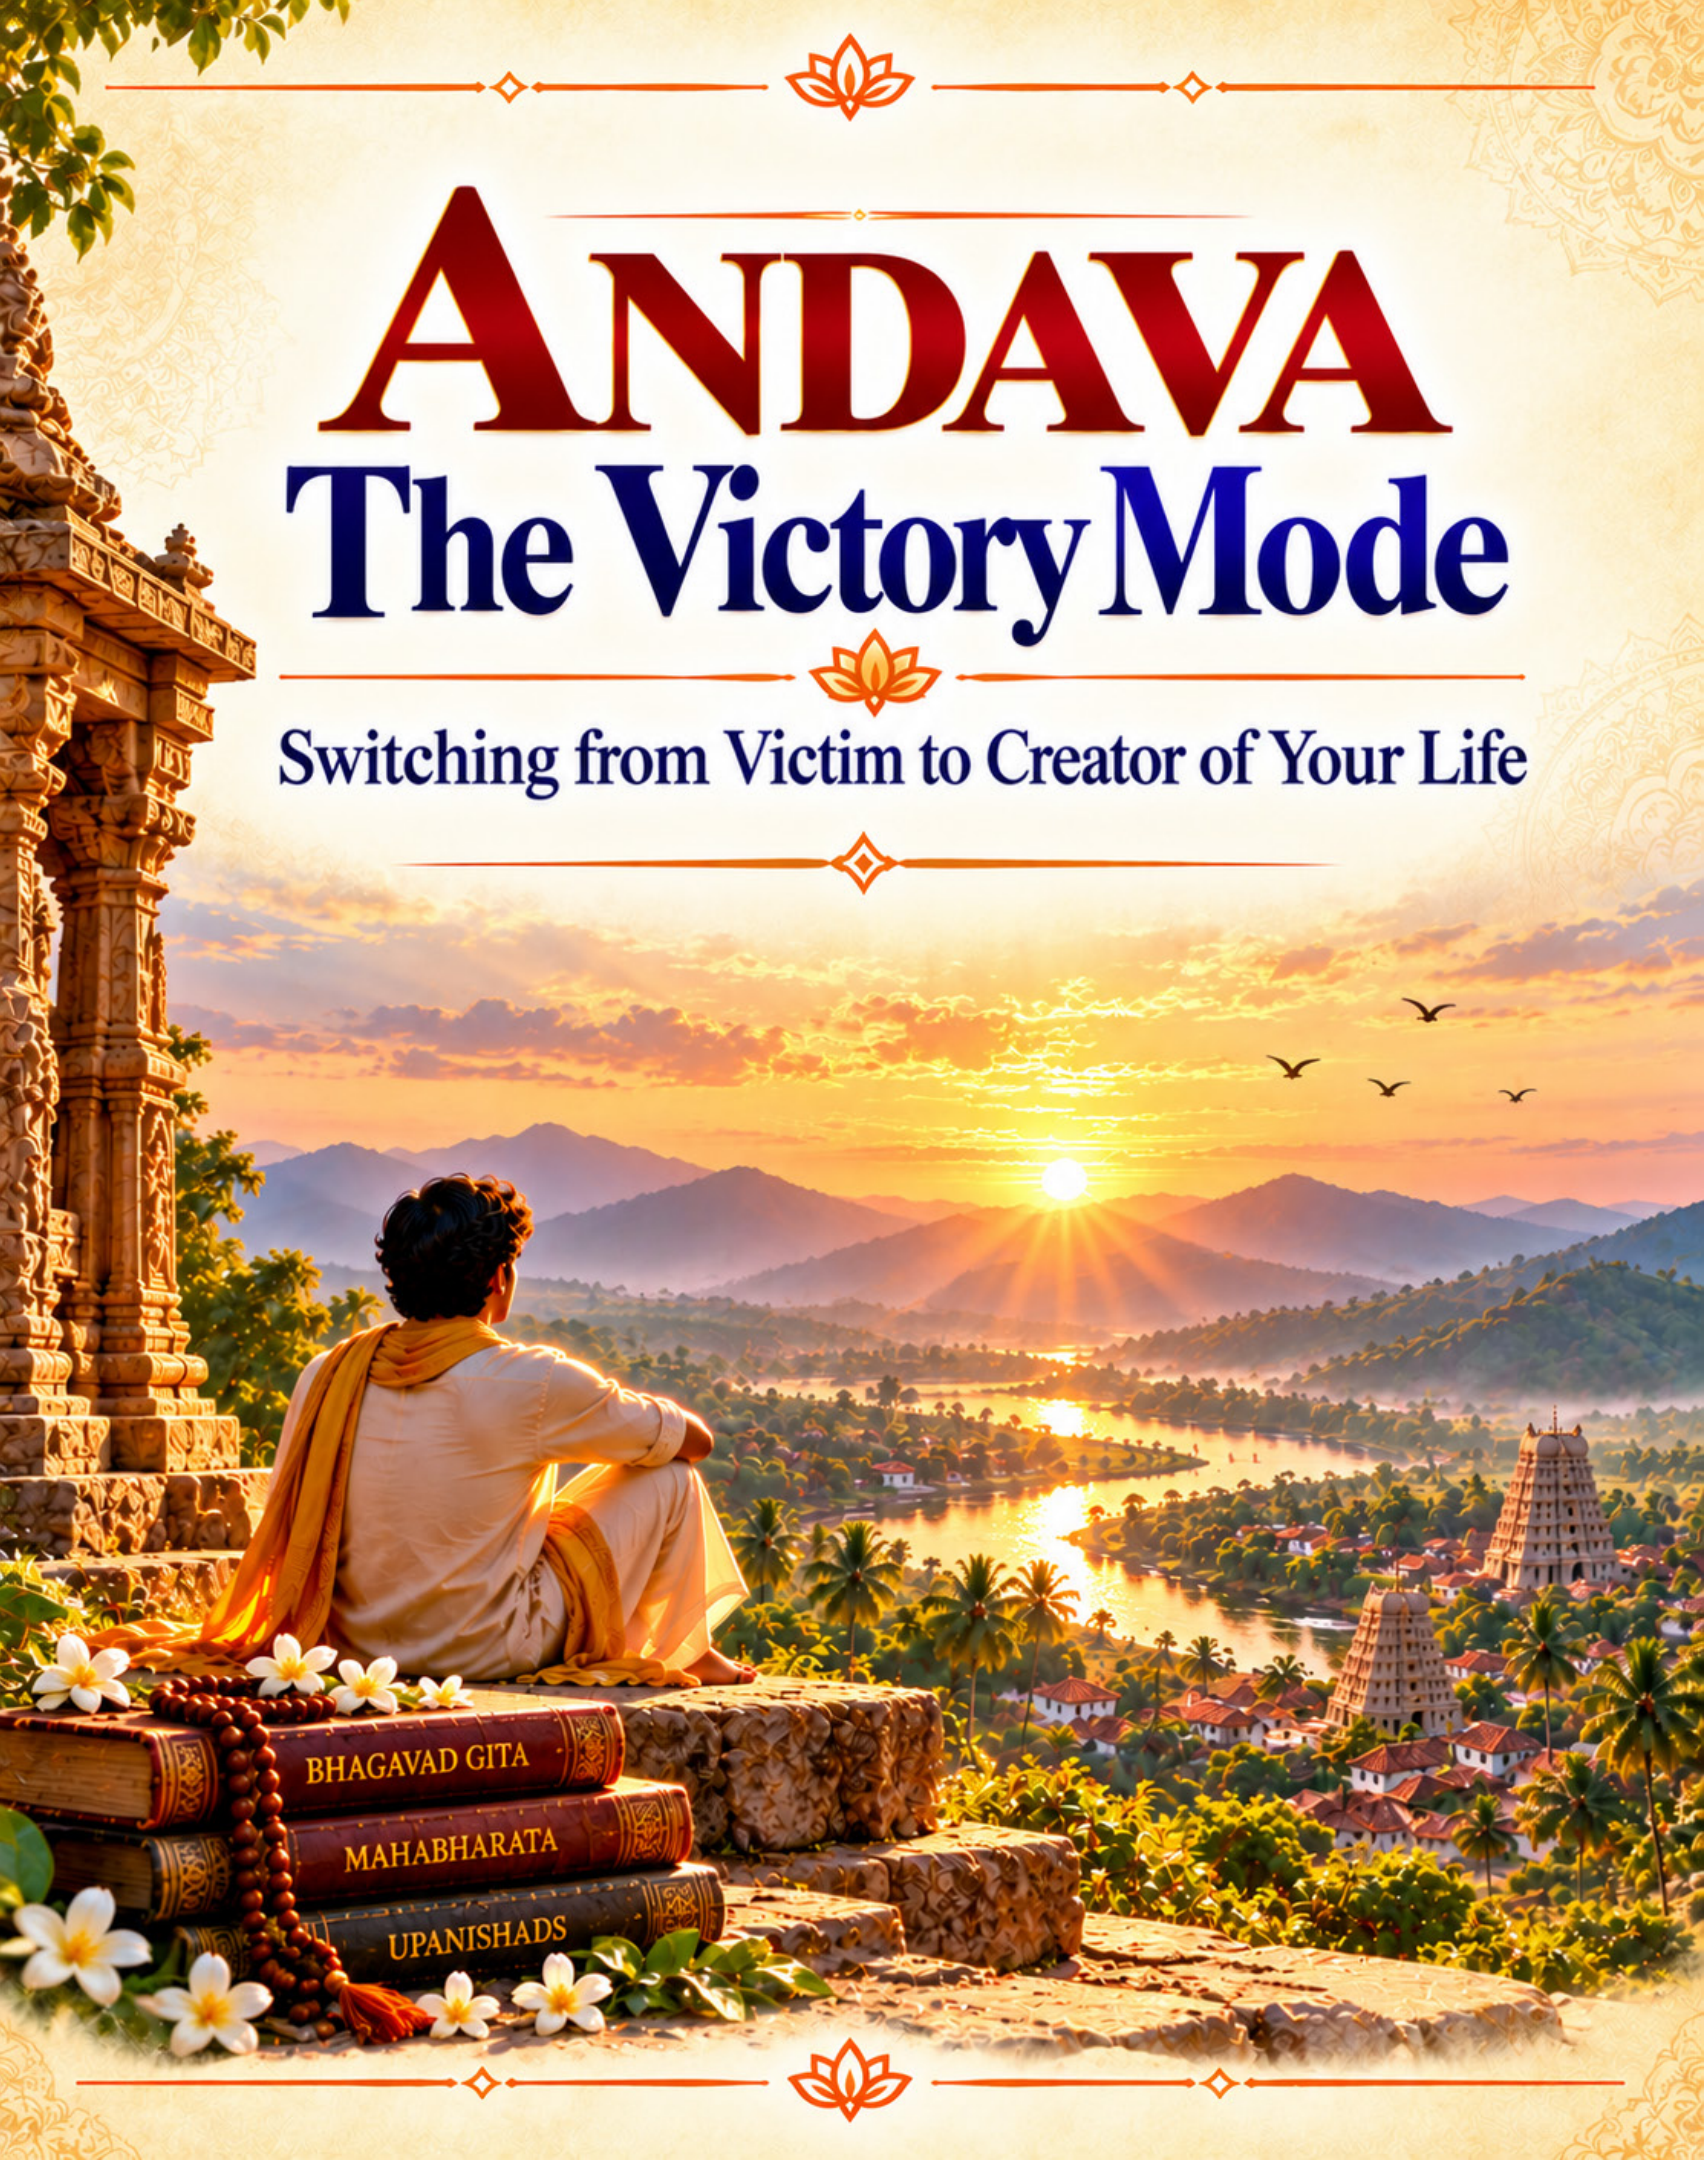
ANDAVA

The Victory Mode

Switching from Victim to Creator of Your Life



INDEX

PART ONE
THE TWO DANCES

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
1	The Old Temple and the Cosmic Dancer	1 - 2
2	Kannan's Question	3 - 4
3	The Dance of Suffering	5 - 6
4	The Dance of Joy	7 - 8
5	The Wisdom of the Grandmother	9 - 10
6	The Night of the Full Moon	11
7	The Dream That Changed Everything	12
8	The Awakening	13

PART TWO
THE VICTIM MODE

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
9	The Curse of Powerlessness	14 - 15
10	Idumban and the Pandavas	16 - 17
11	The Programming We Inherit	18
12	The Day the Temple Bell Fell Silent	19
13	The Widow's Lament	20
14	The Farmer's Broken Plow	21
15	The Warrior Who Lost His Sword	22
16	The Community Meeting	23 - 24
17	The Cycle of Suffering	25

PART THREE
THE FOUR CONSEQUENCES

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
18	The Merchant's Four Sons	26 - 27
19	The Law of Karma	28 - 29
20	Viran's Marriage to Meenatchi	30 - 31

INDEX

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
21	Vanan's Voyage Across the Seas	32
22	Vannan's Failed Harvest	33
23	Vaiyan's Rejection	34 - 35
24	The Gathering of the Sons	36
25	The Wisdom of Ayyavayar	37 - 38
26	The Mathematics of Expectation	39 - 40

PART FOUR
THE VICTIM OF EXPECTATION

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
27	The Mango Tree That Would Not Grow Strawberries	41 - 42
28	Vellaiyan's Obsession	43
29	The Outer Picture	44
30	The Traveler with the Golden Chain	45
31	The Day the Mask Fell	46
32	The Industry of Desire	47
33	The Market of Illusions	48
34	The Temptation of the Bazaar	49 - 50
35	The Broken Promise	51
36	Kannan's Realization	52

PART FIVE
KRISHNA'S TEACHING

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
37	The Discovery of the Ancient Text	53
38	The Song of the Lord	54
39	Arjuna's Despair	55
40	Krishna's Answer	56

INDEX

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
41	The Seed and Its DNA	57
42	The Farmer and the Mango Grove	58
43	The Lesson of the Banyan Tree	59
44	Stop Expecting	60
45	The Art of Letting Go	61
46	Leave It to the Universe	62
47	The Prayer of Surrender	63

PART SIX
FROM KARMA TO DHARMA

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
48	The Five Intelligences	64
49	The Karma Villain	65 - 66
50	The Sixth and Seventh Doors	67
51	The Path of Dharma	68
52	The Dharma Warrior	69
53	The Battle Within	70
54	The Victory of the Self	71
55	The Teaching of the Grandmother	72

PART SEVEN
THE PANDAVA STATE

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
56	The Five Brothers	73
57	Yudhisthira - The King of Truth	74
58	Bhima - The Warrior of Strength	75
59	Arjuna - The Archer of Focus	76
60	Nakula - The Beauty of Grace	77

INDEX

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
61	Sahadeva - The Scholar of Wisdom	78
62	The Brotherhood	79
63	The Kingdom of Indraprastha	80
64	The Game of Dice	81
65	The Exile in the Forest	82
66	The War of Kurukshetra	83
67	The Victory	84
68	Peaceful, Purposeful, Powerful	85
69	The All-Possibility Zone	86
70	Becoming Pandava	87

PART EIGHT
THE CONDITIONED MIND

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
71	The Boiling Milk	88
72	The Story of the Heated Water	89
73	One Man's Food, Another Man's Poison	90
74	The Feast of Many Tastes	91
75	The Snake and the Serpent Lord	92
76	The Fear and the Devotion	93
77	The Illusion of Like and Dislike	94
78	The Conditioned State	95
79	The Natural State	96
80	Returning Home	97

INDEX

PART NINE
APPLICATIONS AND PRACTICES

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
81	Morning Rituals	98
82	The Practice of Peace	99
83	The Discovery of Purpose	100
84	The Cultivation of Power	101
85	The Art of Non-Attachment	102
86	The Discipline of Action	103
87	The Surrender of Outcome	104
88	The Integration of Intelligences	105
89	The Practice of Detachment	106
90	The Path of Mastery	107

EPILOGUE:
BECOMING PROFESSIONAL

Chapter No.	Title	Page No.
91	The Final Teaching	108
92	The Mastery of Life	109
93	Taking Photos in Angle	110
94	The Professional State	111
95	The Legacy of Pazhayur	112

APPENDICES

Appendix	Title	Page No.
A	Glossary of Tamil Terms	114 - 115
B	Historical Context of the Pandavas	116
C	The Philosophy of the Bhagavad Gita	117
D	The Concept of Karma and Dharma	118
E	Reflection Questions	119
F	Daily Practices	120
G	Journal Prompts	121
H	Meditation Guide	122 - 123
I	The Story of the Naga and the Snake	124
J	The Complete Transcript of the Original Discourse	125 - 126

FOREWORD

This book is not a philosophical treatise.
It is a wake-up call.

The words you are about to read are inspired by a live discourse — raw, repetitive, and relentless.
The repetition is intentional.
It is designed to break through the conditioned mind that has kept you trapped in what the speaker
calls Tandava: the dance of the victim.

For years, you have been taught that the world is powerful and you are powerless. That peace is fragile and easily stolen. That purpose is something you must search for outside yourself.

Everything changes when you realize:

Pandava is not Pandava.
Pandava is Andava.

Welcome to the all-possibility zone.

FOREWORD

This story is set in the ancient Tamil land of Pazhayur, a village nestled in the shadow of the Nilgiris. Here, the old traditions of the Pandavas — the five heroic brothers — are still remembered. Here, the Ananda-tandava of Shiva, the cosmic dance of bliss, is still celebrated. And here, a young man named Kannan will discover that the greatest battle is not fought on any battlefield, but within the human heart.

The characters in this book are fictional, but their struggles are real. They represent the eternal human condition: the search for peace, purpose, and power in a world that seems designed to rob us of all three. Through their stories, we will explore the ancient wisdom of the Tamil tradition and the timeless teachings of the Bhagavad Gita.

May this book guide you from victim to victor, from suffering to bliss, from Tandava to Andava.

PROLOGUE:
THE VILLAGE OF PAZHAYUR

The sun rose over the Nilgiri hills, painting the sky in shades of gold and crimson. The mist that clung to the valleys began to lift, revealing the ancient village of Pazhayur. For centuries, this village had been a place of learning, of worship, of community. But now, something was wrong.

The great kalampu tree at the village center stood withered, its branches bare. The old women whispered that the tree had been the totem of the Pandavas, and that its decline was a sign of the village's falling fortunes. The murasu — the royal drum — had not sounded in years. The songs of heroism were no longer sung.

In the temple at the edge of the village, the idol of Shiva as Nataraja — the Lord of Dance — stood covered in dust. No one had performed the puja for months. The priest had grown old and weary, and the villagers had forgotten the meaning of the dance. The young people had moved to the cities. The old people sat in silence. The children played without purpose.

But in a small hut near the temple, a boy named Kannan sat cross-legged, listening to his grandmother's stories.

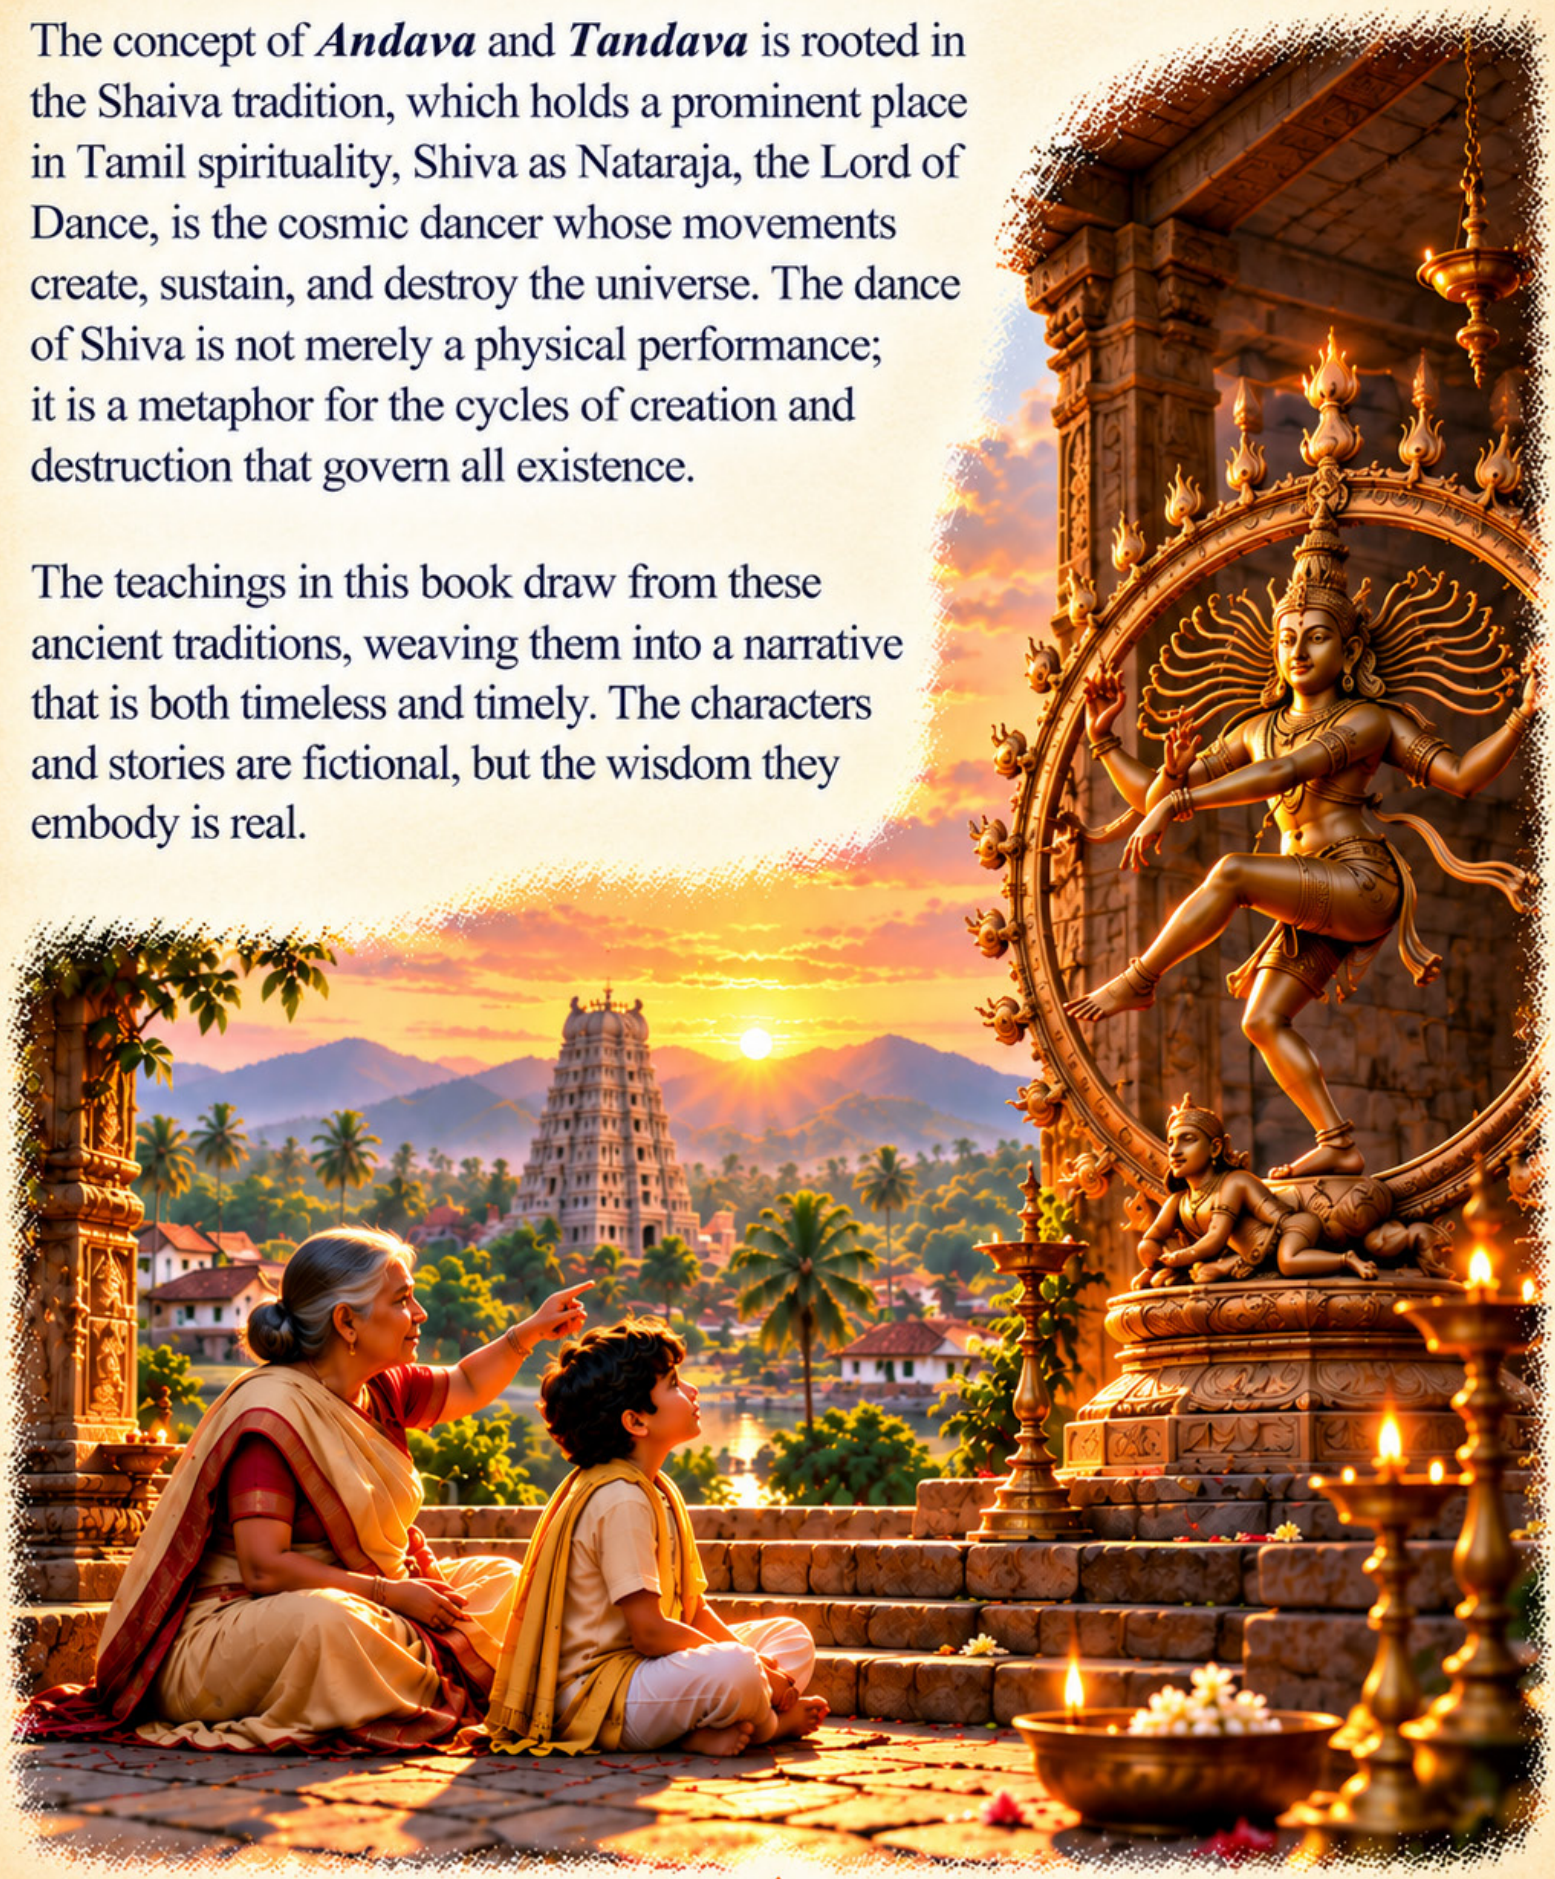
Author's Note on Tamil Tradition

The Tamil tradition is one of the oldest continuous civilizations in the world. Its literature spans over two thousand years, from the ancient Sangam poetry to the modern works of the present day. At the heart of Tamil tradition is the concept of Ananku — a powerful, sacred force that can manifest in individuals, often associated with righteous anger and divine transformation.

The Pandavas, though originally from the north of India, have a deep connection to Tamil culture. The Adivasis of the Nilgiris claim descent from Bhima, the strongest of the Pandava brothers. The Tuyilum Illam — places of worship dedicated to heroic ancestors and martyrs — are scattered throughout the Tamil countryside.

The concept of Andava and Tandava is rooted in the Shaiva tradition, which holds a prominent place in Tamil spirituality, Shiva as Nataraja, the Lord of Dance, is the cosmic dancer whose movements create, sustain, and destroy the universe. The dance of Shiva is not merely a physical performance; it is a metaphor for the cycles of creation and destruction that govern all existence.

The teachings in this book draw from these ancient traditions, weaving them into a narrative that is both timeless and timely. The characters and stories are fictional, but the wisdom they embody is real.



PART ONE:
THE TWO DANCES

CHAPTER 1

The Old Temple and the Cosmic Dancer

The temple of Pazhayur was ancient beyond memory. The stones were worn smooth by centuries of bare feet. The carvings on the walls told stories of gods and demons, of kings and heroes, of love and war. The gopuram — the tower above the sanctum — was covered in intricate sculptures of deities, celestial beings, and mythical creatures.

But the most magnificent carving was the one at the heart of the temple: Shiva as Nataraja, the Cosmic Dancer.

His four arms were spread wide. His right foot crushed the demon of ignorance — the apasmara — a dwarf-like figure representing the forgetfulness of the soul. His left foot was raised in the dance of liberation. His hair flew out in all directions, signifying his uncontrolled energy. And in his hands, he held the damaru — the drum of creation — and the agni — the fire of destruction.

But what captured Kannan's attention most was the expression on the Lord's face. It was not a face of anger or wrath. It was a face of perfect peace. The eyes were half-closed, lost in inner contemplation. The lips were curved in a faint smile. The whole face radiated a sense of calm, of detachment, of divine bliss.

"Why does he look so peaceful?" Kannan asked his grandmother.

"Because he is in the Andava state," she replied. "He has become the creator of the world. He is not a victim of anything. He is victorious. He knows that the world is his creation. He knows that he is powerful. He knows that he has a purpose. He knows that he is at peace."

Kannan stared at the image. He did not know it then, but that image would change his life.

CHAPTER 2

Kannan's Question

Kannan was a curious child. He asked questions that others did not ask. He saw things that others did not see. He felt things that others did not feel. He was different.

One evening, as the sun was setting, Kannan asked his grandmother a question that had been burning in his mind.

"Amma, why is everyone so unhappy?"

His grandmother was silent for a long time. She looked out at the village, at the tired faces, at the slumped shoulders, at the empty eyes.

"Because, my child, everyone believes that the world is powerful and they are powerless. They believe that the government is powerful, that the landlord is powerful, that their husband is powerful, that their wife is powerful."

They believe that their mammy is more powerful than anyone else. They give space to the world to be powerful, and they operate from a space of 'I am powerless.' And then the world takes over."

"But Amma," Kannan said, "isn't the world powerful?"

"The world is powerful only if you allow it to be," she said. "When you are peaceful, purposeful, powerful, you are Andava. Everything is possible for you. When you are peaceless, purposeless, powerless, you have a Tandava — you are dancing in your life, but it is the dance of suffering."

Kannan looked at his grandmother. "How do I become Andava?" he asked.

"You will learn," she said. "But first, you must understand the two dances."

CHAPTER 3

The Dance of Suffering

That night, Kannan had a dream.

He was standing on a battlefield, surrounded by the bodies of warriors. The murasu drums were beating, and the bards were singing songs of heroism. But the faces of the soldiers were not heroic. They were filled with fear. Their eyes were wide with terror. Their hands were trembling. Their bodies were shaking.

A king in golden armor walked through the battlefield, his head held high. “I am powerful,” he declared. “I am the ruler of this land. I am the one who decides the fate of thousands. I am the one who commands the armies. I am the one who makes the laws.”

But as he walked, Kannan saw a ghostly figure dancing behind him. It was the king's own shadow, and it was dancing the Tandava. The shadow was peaceless, purposeless, powerless. The shadow was a victim of the consequences the world was giving him. The shadow was trapped, bound, enslaved.

The king was a prisoner in his own palace. The king was a slave to his own power. The king was a victim of his own expectations. He had expected to be happy. He had expected to be respected. He had expected to be loved. But he was none of these things.

Kannan woke up with a start.

"What does it mean?" he whispered into the darkness.

His grandmother's voice came from the other side of the hut. "It means that even kings can be victims. Even those who seem powerful can be powerless. The true power comes from within. The true peace comes from within. The true purpose comes from within."

CHAPTER 4

The Dance of Joy

The next night, Kannan had another dream.

He was standing in the temple, but the temple was alive. The dust had been swept away. The lamps were lit. The incense was burning. The flowers were fresh. And Shiva himself was dancing.

But this was not the Tandava. This was the Andava — the dance of bliss.

Shiva's face was peaceful. His movements were purposeful. His presence was powerful. And as he danced, Kannan saw that the world was not happening to him — it was happening through him. He was the creator of the world.

He was the source of all creation. He was the one who held the drum of creation and the fire of destruction. He was the one who crushed the demon of ignorance. He was the one who lifted his foot in liberation.

“The world has a purpose,” Shiva’s voice echoed through the temple. “And so do you. This birth has a purpose. You are not a victim of your choices. You are not a victim of your expectations. You are the creator. You are the one who causes. You are the one who chooses. You are the one who acts. And the effect? The effect will not have a choice.”

Kannan woke up with tears streaming down his face. He had seen something that he would never forget. He had seen the truth of existence. He had seen the truth of his own being.

CHAPTER 5

The Wisdom of the Grandmother

Kannan's grandmother, Amirthavalli, was a repository of ancient wisdom. She had learned the stories from her grandmother, who had learned them from her grandmother, going back many generations. The stories were not just tales; they were teachings. They were guides for living. They were maps for the journey of life.

One day, Kannan asked her, "Amma, what is the difference between the Tandava and the Andava?"

"Listen, my child," she said. "The Tandava is the dance of suffering. When you are peaceless, your mind is restless. You cannot sit still. You cannot think clearly. You cannot act wisely. When you are purposeless, you wander. You have no direction. You have no destination. You go here and there, but you never arrive anywhere."

When you are powerless, you are weak. You cannot change your circumstances. You cannot change your situation. You cannot change your life."

"And the Andava?" Kannan asked.

"The Andava is the dance of joy," she said. "When you are peaceful, your mind is calm. You can think clearly. You can act wisely. You can see the truth. When you are purposeful, you have direction. You know where you are going. You know why you are going there. You know what you need to do to get there. When you are powerful, you are strong. You can change your circumstances. You can change your situation. You can change your life."

Kannan nodded. He understood the difference. But he did not yet understand how to make the switch.

CHAPTER 6

The Night of the Full Moon

The full moon rose over Pazhayur, casting a silver glow over the village. The villagers gathered in the temple courtyard for the monthly puja. The old priest, who had served the temple for fifty years, lit the lamps and chanted the mantras.

But something was different this night. The priest was tired. His voice was weak. His hands were trembling. He forgot the words of the mantra. He stumbled over the ritual. And when it was time to ring the bell, he could not lift his arm.

The villagers watched in silence. They felt the power of the temple fading. They felt the protection of the gods leaving them. They felt the peace of the village slipping away.

Kannan watched too. But he did not feel despair. He felt something else. He felt the need to act. He felt the need to take responsibility. He felt the need to become the creator.

CHAPTER 7

The Dream That Changed Everything

That night, Kannan had the most important dream of his life.

He was standing on the edge of a great ocean. The waves were crashing against the shore, roaring and powerful. The sky was dark and stormy. The wind was howling. And Kannan was afraid.

But then, a voice came from the sky. It was the voice of his grandmother, but it was also the voice of the temple, the voice of the village, the voice of the ancestors.

“Kannan,” the voice said, “you are peaceful. You are purposeful. You are powerful. You are Andava. Everything is possible for you. The world is not powerful. You are powerful. the world does not have a purpose. You have a purpose. The world does not have peace. You have peace. You are the creator. You are the cause. You are the one who chooses. You are the one who acts. The effect will not have a choice.”

Kannan stepped forward. He raised his arms. The waves began to calm. The wind began to die down. The clouds began to part. The moon began to shine.

When he woke up, he knew what he had to do.

CHAPTER 8

The Awakening

The next morning, Kannan woke up early. He went to the temple. He swept the dust. He lit the lamps. He rang the bell. He performed the puja.

The villagers watched in astonishment. They had never seen a boy do this before. They had never seen anyone do this before, except the priest. And the priest was too old to do it anymore.

“Kannan,” they said, “what are you doing?”

“I am taking responsibility,” he said. “I am becoming the creator. I am switching from victim mode to victory mode. I am moving from Tandava to Andava.”

The villagers did not understand. But they felt something shift. They felt the power returning. They felt the protection returning. they felt the peace returning.

The temple was alive again. The village was alive again. The people were alive again. And it all started with one boy who chose to act.

PART TWO:
THE VICTIM MODE

CHAPTER 9

The Curse of Powerlessness

The next morning, Kannan went to the village square. The villagers were gathered around the kalampu tree, wailing and crying.

"What happened?" Kannan asked.

"The tree is dead," an old man said. "The tree of the Pandavas. Without it, we are cursed. The world is powerful. We are powerless."

Kannan looked at the tree. It was indeed dead. Its branches were bare. Its bark was dry. Its roots were withered. It was a symbol of the village's decline.

But Kannan remembered the carving in the temple, and he remembered his dream. "The tree is not the source of our power," he said. "We are."

The villagers stared at him. They had never heard such words. They had always believed that the tree was sacred, that it protected them, that it gave them power. But the tree was dead.

"Listen to me," Kannan continued. "All along, we have believed that the world is powerful and we have no power. We have believed that the world has a purpose and we have no clue what our part is. We have believed that anything and everything happens only to disturb our peace. But that is the programming. That is the mindset. That is the way of life."

The villagers did not understand. They had been victims for so long that they did not know how to be anything else. They had been taught that they were powerless. They had been taught that they were victims. They had been taught that they could not change.

"You have been living in victim mode," Kannan said. "You have been giving space to the world to be powerful. You have been operating from a space of 'I am powerless.' You have been thinking that whatever is happening is happening to you, that you have no control over it, that it comes, it happens, and you have to face it. You have been thinking that you have to oblige it, that you have to become a victim of the consequences the world is giving you."

The villagers were silent. They recognized themselves in his words.

CHAPTER 10

Idumban and the Pandavas

In the days that followed, Kannan's grandmother told him the story of Idumban and the Pandavas.

"Long ago," she said, "the five Pandava brothers wandered through these hills. They were not the sons of the same father, nor were they brothers by birth. They were five heroes who had formed a brotherhood, a brotherhood that lived together and fought together."

"Who were they?" Kannan asked.

"Yudhisthira was the king, the embodiment of truth. Bhima was the warrior, the embodiment of strength. Arjuna was the archer, the embodiment of focus. Nakula was the beauty, the embodiment of grace. Sahadeva was the scholar, the embodiment of wisdom."

"And their mother?" Kannan asked.

“Their mother was Kunthi Devi, a gracious lady who received them with Dravidian hospitality. She was the knitting bond of the five. And Bhima, the strongest of them, was the prominent factor, the one to whom the others were attracted.”

Kannan listened, fascinated. “What happened to them?”

“The Pandavas lived in the forest of Idumbi, a place of great fortune. Bhima married Idumbi, a lady of great fortune and the owner of a fertile forest. Their descendants, the Todas of the Nilgiris, claim to be the children of Kadorkasa, son of Bhima. And then the Pandavas went forth to achieve their long-cherished end: victory.”

“The Pandavas were not victims,” Kannan’s grandmother said. “They were victorious. They switched over from victim mode to victory mode. They moved from the human space to the Andava space.”

CHAPTER 11

The Programming We Inherit

Kannan began to notice something in the village.

He noticed that his mother always said, “I am powerless. I am just a woman.”

He noticed that the farmers always said, “We are powerless. The rains are in the hands of the gods.”

He noticed that the laborers always said, “We are powerless. The landlord controls everything.”

He noticed that the children always said, “We are powerless. Our parents decide everything.”

And he noticed that they were all victims. They had all been programmed to believe that they were powerless. They had all been taught that they could not change. They had all been conditioned to accept their fate.

“The world is powerful, I have no power. I am powerless.”
“The world has a purpose, I have no clue what is my part in it.”
“This birth has a purpose, I have no clue what is the purpose of my birth.”
“Anything and everything happens only to disturb my peace.”

This was the programming. This was the mindset. This was the way of life.
And Kannan knew, with all his heart, that it had to change.

CHAPTER 12

The Day the Temple Bell Fell Silent

One day, the temple bell fell silent.
The old priest had died.
No one came to ring the bell.
The villagers said, “The priest has died. The temple is powerless. We are powerless.”

But Kannan walked to the temple, climbed the steps, and took hold of the rope. He pulled with all his strength. The bell rang out across the village.

The villagers looked up in astonishment. They had never seen anyone ring the bell except the priest. They had never thought that anyone else could ring it.

“The bell does not ring because of the priest,” Kannan said. “It rings because someone rings it. The power does not come from the priest. It comes from the one who takes action.”

Kannan was teaching a lesson that the villagers had forgotten: you are the cause. You are the one who creates the effect. You are not a victim of consequences. You are the creator of them.

CHAPTER 13

The Widow's Lament

There was a widow in the village named Visalakshi. Her husband had died five years ago. She had two children. She worked in the fields, cleaned houses, and took in washing. She was always tired. She was always sad. She was always complaining.

"The world is against me," she would say. "The gods have abandoned me. Fate has cursed me. I am a victim of circumstances."

Kannan went to her one day. "Auntie," he said, "why do you think you are a victim?"

"Because I am," she said. "I have no husband. I have no money. I have no family. I have nothing."

"But you have children," Kannan said. "You have health. You have work. You have strength. You have purpose. You are not a victim. You are a survivor."

Visalakshi stared at him. No one had ever spoken to her this way. No one had ever told her that she had power.

"You are not a victim of your choices," Kannan said. "You are a victim of your expectations. You expected a life of comfort. You expected a life of ease. You expected a life of safety. But life did not give you those things. So you became a victim. But you are not a victim. You are the creator. You are the one who causes. You are the one who chooses. You are the one who acts."

CHAPTER 14

The Farmer's Broken Plow

There was a farmer named Chinnasamy. He had a plow that had broken. He had no money to fix it. So he sat under a tree and did nothing.

"The world has abandoned me," he said. "There is nothing I can do. I am a victim of poverty."

Kannan went to him. "Chinnasamy," he said, "why are you sitting there doing nothing?"

"I have no plow," he said. "I cannot work. I cannot earn money. I cannot feed my family."

"But you have hands," Kannan said. "You have strength. You have knowledge. You can fix the plow yourself. You can borrow a plow from someone else. You can do something else. You are not a victim. You are the creator. You are the one who causes. You are the one who chooses. You are the one who acts."

Chinnasamy stared at him. He had never thought of it this way. He had always believed that he was a victim of circumstances. He had always believed that there was nothing he could do. But Kannan's words planted a seed in his mind.

CHAPTER 15

The Warrior Who Lost His Sword

There was a warrior named Maruthan. He had lost his sword in a battle. He was ashamed. He hid from the world. He refused to come out of his house.

“I am a warrior without a sword,” he said. “I am powerless. I am a victim of fate.”

Kannan went to him. “Maruthan,” he said, “why are you hiding?”

“I have lost my sword,” he said. “A warrior without a sword is not a warrior. I am nothing.”

“But you have your hands,” Kannan said. “You have your training. You have your knowledge. You can fight without a sword. You can find another sword. You can do something else. You are not a victim. You are the creator. You are the one who causes. You are the one who chooses. You are the one who acts.”

Maruthan stared at him. He had never thought of it this way. He had always believed that his sword was his source of power. But Kannan’s words revealed a deeper truth.

CHAPTER 16

The Community Meeting

Kannan called a meeting of the village. The villagers gathered in the temple courtyard. They were curious. They were skeptical. But they came.

“Listen to me,” Kannan said. “We have been victims for too long. We have been programming ourselves to believe that we are powerless. We have been taught that the world is powerful and we are not. We have been taught that the world has a purpose and we do not. We have been taught that anything and everything happens only to disturb our peace.”

“But that is the programming,” he continued. “That is the mindset. That is the way of life. But it is not the truth. The truth is that we are peaceful. We are purposeful. We are powerful. The truth is that we are Andava. Everything is possible for us.”

The villagers were silent. They had never heard such words. They had never considered the possibility that they might be powerful.

"Till now, the world was powerful, you were powerless," Kannan said. "You did not know your purpose. You thought you were living a purposeless life. Most of you did not know why you were born, what you were doing, what for this janma, why you were doing what, everything. You were having no truth which means you were purposeless."

"But you do have a purpose," he said. "You have a purpose.
You were born for a reason.
You are here for a reason.
You have something to do.
You have something to achieve.
You have something to create."

CHAPTER 17

The Cycle of Suffering

Kannan's grandmother, Amirthavalli, spoke to the village for the first time in years.

"Listen to my grandson," she said. "He speaks the truth. For too long, we have been living in the cycle of suffering. We have been peaceless, purposeless, powerless. We have been victims of our expectations. We have been victims of our choices. We have been victims of our circumstances."

"But it does not have to be this way," she said. "We can switch over from victim mode to victory mode. We can switch over from the human space to the Andava space. We can become peaceful, purposeful, powerful. We can become the creators of our world."

The villagers listened. They had always respected Amirthavalli. They had always known she was wise. And now, her words carried even more weight.

"Day by day in every way you will become peaceless, purposeless, powerless," she said, "and you will feel as a victim. But moving from this space of a victim mode to the other space, it will become peaceful. Really peaceful, very peaceful. Very purposeful and very powerful."

PART THREE: THE FOUR CONSEQUENCES

CHAPTER 18

The Merchant's Four Sons

In the nearby town of Kanchipuram, there lived a wealthy merchant named Ayyavayar. He had four sons, each of whom wanted to make his mark in the world.

The first son, Viran, was bold and adventurous. "I want to be a warrior," he said. "I will fight battles and win fame. I will be remembered in the songs of bards. I will be honored by kings. I will be feared by enemies."

The second son, Vanan, was ambitious and cunning. "I want to be a merchant," he said. "I will trade with far-off lands and become richer than my father. I will cross the seas. I will visit foreign kingdoms. I will amass great wealth."

The third son, Vannan, was gentle and patient. “I want to be a farmer,” he said. “I will grow crops that will feed the village. I will work the land. I will care for the soil. I will provide for the people.”

The fourth son, Vaiyan, was wise and studious. “I want to be a scholar,” he said. “I will learn the Vedas and teach the young. I will study the scriptures. I will understand the mysteries of existence. I will pass on the knowledge to the next generation.”

Ayyavayar blessed his sons. “Go forth,” he said, “and fulfill your dreams. But remember: for every choice, there is a consequence. You cannot stop the consequence. Consequence is given. Be prepared for all possible outcomes.”

CHAPTER 19

The Law of Karma

Vaiyan, the fourth son, was intrigued by his father's words. "What is this law?" he asked. "The law of cause and effect?"

His father nodded. "Yes, my son. This law has been termed as the law of karma. All along we have learned that karma has its way. Karma has its power. Karma only takes care of the functioning of human life or any life. As you sow, so you reap."

Vaiyan thought for a moment. "So for every action, there will be a reaction?"

"Exactly," his father said. "And the reaction will have only four options. You get what you want. You get more than what you want. You get less than what you want. You get the opposite of what you want. You should be prepared for all four options."

Vaiyan remembered his rejection by the old teachers. "But I wanted only one option," he said. "I wanted to be a scholar. I did not expect rejection."

"That is your mistake," his father said. "You made a choice. You studied. But you went to God and prayed. 'I want this effect. I want this effect.' You made your expectation your only option. You were not prepared for the other three."

CHAPTER 20

Viran's Marriage to Meenatchi

The following year, Viran, the eldest son, was to be married. The bride was Meenatchi, the daughter of a wealthy landowner. The wedding was lavish, with musicians and dancers, feasts and festivities. The whole town of Kanchipuram came to celebrate.

But on the wedding night, Viran discovered that his bride was not what he had expected.

In some aspects, Meenatchi was more than what he had wanted. She was beautiful, kind, and intelligent. She had a gentle voice and a warm smile. She was skilled in the arts of the home. She was respectful to her elders.

In some aspects, she was what he had wanted. She was from a good family, well-educated, and respectful. She was well-versed in the scriptures. She could manage a household. She could handle servants.

In some aspects, she was less than what he had wanted. She did not share his passion for warfare, preferring instead the quiet life of the home. She was not interested in weapons or battles. She did not want to hear about his adventures. She was afraid of horses and elephants.

And in some aspects, she was the opposite of what he had wanted. She was outspoken and independent, not the docile wife he had imagined. She had her own opinions. She did not always agree with him. She sometimes challenged his decisions. She was not afraid to speak her mind.

Viran was angry. He felt cheated. “I expected one thing,” he said, “and I got something else. I am a victim of fate.”

CHAPTER 21

Vanan's Voyage Across the Seas

The second son, Vanan, built a fleet of ships. He loaded them with spices, silks, and precious stones. He sailed across the seas to distant lands. He visited kingdoms that no one in Kanchipuram had ever heard of. He traded with foreign merchants. He learned new languages. He saw new cultures.

He returned with more wealth than he had ever dreamed. His ships were full of gold, silver, and gems. His warehouses were overflowing with exotic goods. His name was known throughout the land.

But Vanan was not satisfied. He wanted more. He wanted to be richer than any merchant in history. He wanted to own the world. He wanted to be the master of all trade.

His father saw his discontent. "You have gotten more than what you wanted," he said. "Why are you not satisfied?"

"Because I want more," Vanan said. "I want everything. I am the victim of my ambition."

"You are not a victim of your ambition," his father said. "You are a victim of your expectation. You expected to be happy when you got wealth. But wealth did not make you happy. So you became a victim of your expectation."

CHAPTER 22

Veera's Failed Harvest

The third son, Veera, worked the fields for a year. He plowed the soil. He planted the seeds. He watered the crops. He cared for the plants. He did everything right.

But the rains did not come. The sun was too hot. The soil was too dry. The crops withered. The harvest failed.

Veera was devastated. "I did everything right," he said. "Why did this happen? Why did the gods abandon me? Why am I a victim of fate?"

His father came to him. "The rains did not come," he said. "That is not your fault. You planted the seeds. You watered the crops. You did your work. But the outcome was not in your hands. You got less than what you wanted. But you are not a victim of fate. You are a victim of your expectation. You expected a good harvest. You expected plenty. But life gave you less. So you became a victim."

"What should I do?" Veera asked.

"Plant again," his father said. "Work again. Do your duty. But do not expect the outcome. Leave the outcome to the universe. Do your work for the sake of the work. Not for the sake of the result."

CHAPTER 23

Vaiyan's Rejection

The fourth son, Vaiyan, studied for years. He memorized the Vedas. He learned the Upanishads. He understood the mysteries of existence. He was ready to become a teacher.

But the old teachers of the town rejected him. “You are from a merchant family,” they said. “You are not of the priestly class. You cannot teach. You cannot be a scholar.”

Vaiyan was heartbroken. “I have done everything right,” he said. “I have studied. I have learned. I have understood. Why have they rejected me? Why am I a victim of discrimination?”

CHAPTER 23

Vaiyan's Rejection

His father came to him. "They rejected you because of your birth," he said. "That is not your fault. You did your work. You studied. You learned. But the outcome was not in your hands."

You got the opposite of what you wanted. But you are not a victim of discrimination. You are a victim of your expectation. You expected acceptance. You expected respect. But life gave you rejection. So you became a victim."

"What should I do?" Vaiyan asked.

"Teach anyway," his father said. "Find students who will listen. Share your knowledge. Do your work. But do not expect the outcome. Leave the outcome to the universe. Do your work for the sake of the work. Not for the sake of the result."

CHAPTER 24

The Gathering of the Sons

Ayyavayar called his four sons together.

"Look at your lives," he said. "Viran, you got what you wanted in some aspects, less in others, more in others, and the opposite in others. Vanan, you got more than what you wanted, but you are not satisfied. Veera, you got less than what you wanted, and you are devastated. Vaiyan, you got the opposite of what you wanted, and you are heartbroken."

"Now listen to me," he continued. "You have all experienced the four possible consequences. You get what you want. You get more than what you want. You get less than what you want. You get the opposite of what you want. Life is always like that. For every choice, there is a consequence. You cannot stop the consequence. Consequence is given."

"Be prepared for all four consequences," he said. "Do not expect only what you want. Expect all four. And when the consequence comes, do not become a victim of it. Become the creator of your next action."

CHAPTER 25

The Wisdom of Ayyavayar

Ayyavayar sat his sons down for a final lesson.

"You order food in a hotel," he said. "You may get the way you like it. You may get more than the way you like it — super good. You may get less than your standard of liking. Or you may get the opposite — the worst dish you have ever tasted. There are only four possible consequences."

"In some aspects of your life, you get more than what you wanted. In some aspects, you get what you wanted. In some aspects, you get less. In some aspects, you get the opposite. Life is always like that."

“For every choice we have, there is a consequence. When you make a choice, you cannot stop the consequence. Consequence is given. Cause and effect. This is the law of karma. As you sow, so you reap.”

“The effect has only four options. You should be prepared for all four. But what do we do? We go to God and pray. ‘I want this effect. I want this effect.’ We make our expectation our only option. And when the outcome is different, we become victims.”

CHAPTER 26

The Mathematics of Expectation

Vaiyan, the scholar, continued to study. He became fascinated by the patterns of expectation.

“Father,” he said one day, “I have noticed that for every action, there is a consequence. And the consequence has only four options. That means 25% of the time, the consequence will be what I expect. 25% of the time, it will be more than what I expect, 25% of the time, it will be less. And 25% of the time, it will be the opposite.”

His father smiled. “You are learning, my son. This is the mathematics of expectation.”

"So when I go to God and pray for a specific outcome," Vaiyan said, "I am praying for only one of four possibilities. But 25% is already guaranteed, by pure probability. That is why Muslims are very good — I am joking."

His father laughed. "You have understood the truth, my son. People think that when their prayers are answered, it is a miracle. But probability says that 25% of the time, their prayers will be answered by chance. That is why you should not be attached to the outcome. The cause is always there. You are causing every day. The effect will not have a choice."

PART FOUR
THE VICTIM OF EXPECTATION

CHAPTER 27

The Mango Tree That Would Not Grow Strawberries

In the village of Pazhayur, there lived a farmer named Vellaiyan. He grew mangoes. His mangoes were famous throughout the district. They were sweet, juicy, and fragrant.

But Vellaiyan was not satisfied. “Strawberries sell for more money,” he told his wife. “I will plant strawberries. I will become rich. I will be the envy of the village.”

He planted strawberries. They grew for a while, then wilted. The sun was too hot. The soil was too dry. The plants could not survive.

“What happened?” Vellaiyan cried. “I poured water on the seed! It should have grown!”

“The law of karma,” his grandmother told him, “says that if you put a mango, a mango will grow. If you put an apple, an apple will grow. If you put a coconut, a coconut will grow. But strawberries do not grow in our country. You cannot expect something that the land cannot give.”

Vellaiyan did not listen. He planted strawberries again. And again they wilted.

“Why doesn’t it grow?” he cried.

“Because your expectation is not aligned with reality,” his grandmother said. “You are a victim of your expectation. You are not a victim of your choice. You chose to plant strawberries. That was your choice. But your expectation was that they would grow, regardless of the conditions. That is your mistake.”

CHAPTER 28

Vellaiyan's Obsession

Vellaiyan became obsessed with strawberries. He spent all his money on seeds. He built a shade to protect the plants. He carried water from the river. He did everything he could.

But the strawberries still did not grow.

His wife begged him to stop. "We are losing money," she said. "We are losing time. We are losing our sanity. Please stop."

But Vellaiyan could not stop. He was driven by his expectation. He believed that if he worked hard enough, he would get what he wanted. He believed that the universe owed him a reward. He believed that he was entitled to success.

One day, he collapsed in the field. He was exhausted, dehydrated, and broken.

"You have become a victim of your expectation," his grandmother said. "You are not a victim of your choice. Your choice was to plant strawberries. That was a reasonable choice. But your expectation — that they would grow despite all evidence — that is what has destroyed you."

CHAPTER 29

The Outer Picture

One day, a traveler came to Pazhayur. He wore fine clothes and a gold chain. He arrived on a decorated elephant. He had servants carrying his luggage. He had musicians playing his praises.

"I have a beautiful wife," the traveler announced. "I am the wealthiest man in my village. My life is fantastic. I have everything I want. I have more than I want. I am the happiest man in the world."

The villagers were impressed. They gathered around him, asking for his blessings. They touched his feet. They offered him food. They gave him gifts.

But Kannan's grandmother, Amirthavalli, who had seen many such travelers, was not impressed. She whispered to Kannan, "Only they know the truth. They know their own truth. But they show an outer picture. That is their expectation. That is not the reality."

Later that night, the traveler's servant came to the grandmother's hut. "Please, Amma," he said, "my master is not well. His wife left him. He has lost his wealth. He has come here hoping to find a new life. Please do not tell the villagers."

The grandmother smiled. "I know. I always know. The outer picture is just a picture. The truth is inside."

CHAPTER 30

The Day the Mask Fell

The next day, the traveler collapsed in the village square. His servants tried to revive him. His musicians stopped playing. His elephant ran away.

The villagers gathered around. They saw the truth. The traveler was not wealthy. The gold chain was fake. The fine clothes were borrowed. The elephant was rented. The wife had left him years ago.

"I am a fraud," the traveler wept. "I am a victim of my expectations. I expected to be rich. I expected to be happy. I expected to be respected. But none of those things happened. So I invented them. I created an outer picture. I pretended to be someone I was not."

The villagers were stunned. They had been fooled. They had been deceived. But they had also learned a lesson.

"The outer picture is not the truth," Kannan said. "The truth is inside. The truth is what you are, not what you pretend to be. The truth is your peace, your purpose, your power. Not your wealth, your status, or your appearance."

CHAPTER 31

The Industry of Desire

Kannan watched the villagers around him. He saw how they looked at the fine clothes of the traveler. He saw how they coveted the gold chain. He saw how they dreamed of being like him. He saw how their eyes lit up with desire.

"They feed on your expectation," his grandmother said. "They trigger your desire. They increase your expectation and sell things."

"What do you mean, Amma?" Kannan asked.

"Think, my child. The industry of desire — it is everywhere. It promises you a fantasy world. A dream world. 'Buy this, and you will be happy.' 'Wear this, and you will be beautiful.' 'Do this, and you will be powerful.' When high expectation is promised, you go there. You spend your money. You waste your time. And in the end, what do you have? An outer picture. Not reality."

Kannan remembered the traveler. "So that is why he came here," he said. "He expected happiness from things. But things did not give him happiness. They gave him an outer picture."

CHAPTER 32

The Market of Illusions

The market in Pazhayur was held every Thursday. Farmers brought their produce. Merchants brought their wares. Women brought their crafts. The market was a place of exchange, of connection, of community.

But it was also a place of illusions. Vendors shouted promises. “The best rice in the district!” “The sweetest mangoes in the land!” “The most beautiful fabrics in the world!” “The most precious jewels in existence!”

Kannan walked through the market. He saw the faces of the villagers. They were hungry for more. They were never satisfied. They always wanted the next thing. They always expected the next thing. They were victims of their expectations.

“Look at them,” his grandmother said. “They are chasing an outer picture. They are chasing a fantasy. They are chasing a dream. But the dream is not real. The fantasy is not real. The only reality is inside. The only reality is peace, purpose, and power.”

Kannan understood. The market was a symbol of the industry of desire. It was everywhere. It was inescapable. But it was also an illusion. And he could choose not to be fooled by it.

CHAPTER 33

The Temptation of the Bazaar

Kannan watched the villagers around him. He saw how they looked at the fine clothes of the traveler. He saw how they coveted the gold chain. He saw how they dreamed of being like him. He saw how their eyes lit up with desire.

Kannan wanted it. He had never wanted anything so much. He could see himself wearing it around his neck. He could see himself showing it to his friends. He could see himself being admired for it.

But then he remembered his grandmother's words. "They feed on your expectation. They trigger your desire. They increase your expectation and sell things."

He looked at the pendant again. He realized that he did not need it. He realized that it would not make him happy. He realized that it was just an outer picture. He realized that it was an illusion.

He walked away from the pendant. He felt a sense of freedom. He felt a sense of peace. He felt a sense of power. He had overcome his expectation. He had overcome his desire. He was no longer a victim.

CHAPTER 34

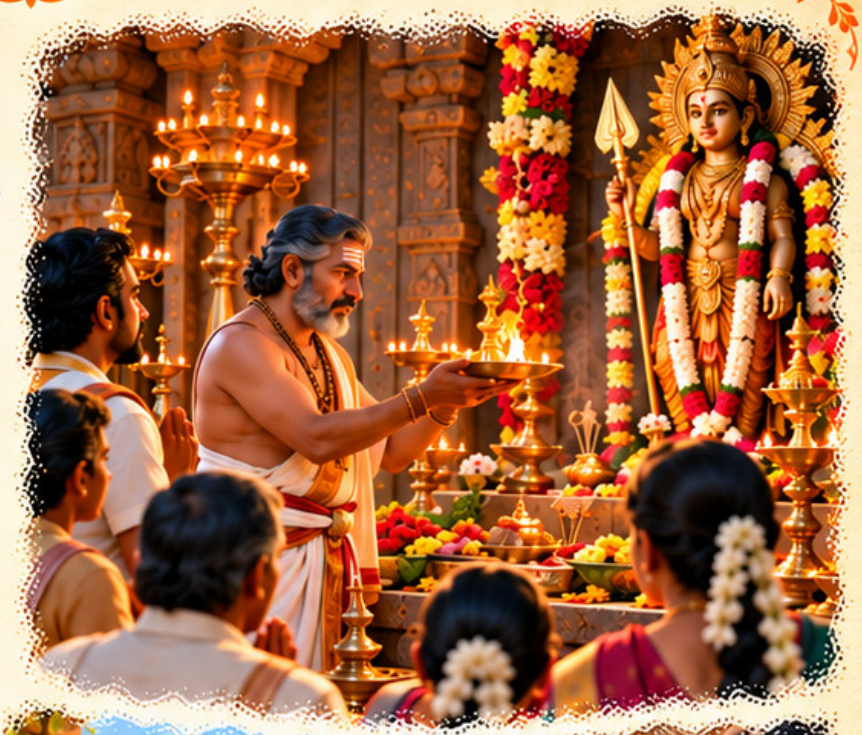
The Broken Promise

The neighboring village of Pudukkottai had a temple dedicated to Murugan, the Lord of the Hills. Every year, the villagers of Pazhayur would make a pilgrimage to this temple. They would walk for three days, carrying offerings and singing songs.

One year, the pilgrimage was particularly difficult. The rains had been heavy. The rivers were flooded. The roads were muddy. The pilgrims struggled.

But the priest of the Pudukkottai temple promised them a miracle. “If you come to the temple,” he said, “Murugan will bless you. Your prayers will be answered. Your wishes will be fulfilled. Your problems will be solved.”

The villagers of Pazhayur made the pilgrimage. They endured the rain. They crossed the rivers. They walked through the mud. They arrived at the temple exhausted but hopeful.



And then nothing happened. The priest took their offerings. He performed the rituals. But no miracle occurred. The rains did not stop. The problems did not disappear. The wishes were not fulfilled.

The villagers were angry. They felt cheated. They felt like victims. "The priest lied to us," they said. "He made a promise he could not keep. He was a fraud."

But Kannan's grandmother said, "The priest did not lie to you. He gave you an expectation. You became a victim of that expectation. You expected a miracle. You expected a solution. You expected something external to change your life.

Only you can change your life. Only you can solve your problems. Only you can fulfill your wishes."

CHAPTER 35

The Broken Promise

Kannan sat alone under the withered kalampu tree. He thought about everything he had learned. The two dances. The victim mode. The four consequences. The mathematics of expectation. The outer picture. The industry of desire. The broken promise.

And he realized something profound.

He was not a victim. He never had been. He had simply believed that he was.
He had believed that the world was powerful and he was powerless.
He had believed that the world had a purpose and he had no clue what his part was.
He had believed that anything and everything happened only to disturb his peace.

But that was the programming. That was the mindset. That was the way of life.
And he could change it.

CHAPTER 36

Kannan's Realization

Kannan realized that the greatest enemy was not the world. It was not the government. It was not the landlord. It was not the priest. It was not even the industry of desire.

The greatest enemy was his own expectation.

He realized that he was not a victim of his choices. He was a victim of his expectations. He had expected things to be easy. He had expected things to be fair. He had expected things to go his way. And when they did not, he had become a victim.

"I will stop expecting," he said to himself. "I will do my work. I will make my choices. I will take my actions. But I will not expect the outcome. I will leave the outcome to the universe."

And in that moment, Kannan felt a great weight lift from his shoulders. He had been carrying the burden of expectation. He had been carrying the burden of outcome. He had been carrying the burden of control. But now, he let it go.

PART FIVE

KRISHNA'S TEACHING

CHAPTER 37

The Discovery of the Ancient Text

The old priest had died. The temple had no priest. But Kannan found a copy of the Bhagavad Gita in the temple's library. It was old, its pages yellowed and fragile. But the words were still legible.

He began to read.

The Song of the Lord spoke to him across the centuries. It was the conversation between Krishna and Arjuna on the battlefield of Kurukshetra. Arjuna was filled with doubt and despair. He did not want to fight. He wanted to run away. He wanted to give up.

But Krishna said to him:

"Do it. Don't expect a lot. Don't say anything about the effect. Don't expect."

Kannan read the words again and again. He realized that Krishna was teaching Arjuna to move from victim mode to victory mode. Arjuna was a victim of his fears. He was a victim of his expectations. He wanted the battle to end without bloodshed. He wanted the effect to be peaceful. But Krishna told him:
"Do what you have to do. Let go of the effect."

CHAPTER 38

The Song of the Lord

Kannan continued to read.
"Krishna says," he read,

"You will get what you want.
You will get what you want.
Do what you have to do.
Let go of the effect.
Don't worry about it."

He read the words again and again. They were simple. They were direct. They were powerful.

"Your maximum worry is boredom, fight, difficulty, challenge. What is that? You don't know what the consequences are. The consequences are in the expectation."

Kannan understood. The consequences were not in the action. They were in the expectation. The action was neutral. The consequence was neutral. But the expectation colored everything. The expectation made the consequence painful or joyful.

"Are you getting me?" he whispered to himself. "What is the pain most of you have? Expectation not met. I expect at 10. I only get 7. I only get 6. I only get 4. I get only 1. I get nothing. It can be anything. I expect at 10. I get 200 lakhs."

CHAPTER 39

Arjuna's Despair

Kannan read the story of Arjuna's despair on the battlefield of Kurukshetra.

Arjuna was the greatest archer in the world. He had defeated the greatest warriors. He had won the most beautiful princess. He had conquered kingdoms. He was a hero.

But on that day, he was filled with doubt.

"I cannot fight," he said. "I cannot kill my own family. I cannot kill my own teachers. I cannot win a kingdom through bloodshed. I cannot be happy with victory. I cannot a happy with defeat. I am a victim of my own conscience. I am a victim of my own fears. I am a victim of my own expectations."

Krishna heard him.

"Why are you worried?" he asked. "Why are you doubting? Why are you despairing?"

"Because I expected peace," Arjuna said. "I expected honor. I expected righteousness. I expected victory. But I got only war. I got only conflict. I got only death. I got only suffering. I am a victim."

CHAPTER 40

Krishna's Answer

Krishna smiled. "You are not a victim," he said. "You are the creator. You are the one who causes. You are the one who chooses. You are the one who acts. The effect will not have a choice."

Arjuna stared at him. "What do you mean?"

"Listen," Krishna said.

"Do it. Don't expect a lot. Don't say anything about the effect. Don't expect. You will get what you want. You will get what you want. Do what you have to do. Let go of the effect. Don't worry about it."

"But how can I let go?" Arjuna asked. "How can I not worry? How can I not expect?"

"Because the consequences are not in your hands," Krishna said. "The consequences are in the hands of the universe. You can only control your actions. You cannot control the outcome. So act. Act with all your heart. Act with all your strength. Act with all your wisdom. But do not expect. Leave the outcome to the universe."

CHAPTER 41

The Seed and Its DNA

Kannan walked to the mango grove. He saw the trees that Vellaiyan's grandfather had planted a hundred years ago. They were tall and strong. They produced sweet fruit.

"If I plant a mango tree," Kannan said to himself, "I will get a mango plant. The plant will come from the DNA of this mango. If it is ripe, it will be ripe. If it is of this size, it will have the same design, It will have the same seed."

He thought about his own life. He was like a seed. His actions were like water. But the outcome was already written in his DNA — not his physical DNA, but the DNA of his character, his choices, his intentions.

"If I plant a mango tree, it will yield a lot of yield. It will not come back," he said. "So stop expecting. Stop expecting the consequence, the result, the effect. Whatever it is, leave it to God. Leave it to existence. Leave it to the universe."

CHAPTER 42

The Farmer and the Mango Grove

Kannan went to Vellaiyan, the farmer who had tried to grow strawberries.

"Vellaiyan," he said, "I have learned something. If you plant a mango, a mango will grow. If you plant an apple, an apple will grow. If you plant a coconut, a coconut will grow. You cannot expect something that the land cannot give."

Vellaiyan nodded. "I know that now," he said. "I wasted years trying to grow strawberries. I was a victim of my expectation."

"You were not a victim of your choice," Kannan said. "Your choice was to plant strawberries. That was a reasonable choice. But your expectation — that they would grow regardless of the conditions — that was your mistake."

"So what should I do now?" Vellaiyan asked.

"Plant mangoes," Kannan said. "Do what works. Do what is natural. Do what is aligned with the land. And do not expect. Do your work. Leave the outcome to the universe."

Vellaiyan planted mangoes. They grew. They flourished. They bore fruit. And Vellaiyan was finally at peace.

CHAPTER 43

The Lesson of the Banyan Tree

Kannan went to Vellaiyan, the farmer who had tried to grow strawberries.

"Vellaiyan," he said, "I have learned something. If you plant a mango, a mango will grow. If you plant an apple, an apple will grow. If you plant a coconut, a coconut will grow. You cannot expect something that the land cannot give."

Vellaiyan nodded. "I know that now," he said. "I wasted years trying to grow strawberries. I was a victim of my expectation."

"You were not a victim of your choice," Kannan said. "Your choice was to plant strawberries. That was a reasonable choice. But your expectation — that they would grow regardless of the conditions — that was your mistake."

"Plant mangoes," Kannan said. Do what works. Do what is natural. Do what is aligned with the land. And do not expect. Do your work. Leave the outcome to the universe."

"So what should I do now?" Vellaiyan asked.

Kannan looked at the tree. He understood. The tree was not a victim. It was a creator. It created its own environment. It created its own conditions. It created its own life.

"The banyan tree is Andava," he said. "It is peaceful, purposeful, powerful. It is the creator of its own world."

"Yes," his grandmother said. "And so are you. You are not a victim of your circumstances. You are the creator of your life. You are the one who causes. You are the one who chooses. You are the one who acts. The effect will not have a choice."

CHAPTER 44

Stop Expecting

Kannan went to the village square and called the villagers together.

"Listen to me," he said. "I have learned something. If you do not do your work, you cannot think of the outcome. That is functioning from the path of karma. The path of karma is for humans. Till now, you are all humans, I believe. Humans function from victim mode. Humans function from karma mode. That is what you have been doing."

The villagers looked at him, curious but skeptical.

"Stop expecting," Kannan said. "Krishna said this beautifully. Stop expecting the consequence, the result, the effect. Whatever it is, leave it to God. Leave it to existence. Leave it to the universe."

"But how can we stop expecting?" an old woman asked. "We have expected all our lives."

"You can start now," Kannan said. "It is not easy. But it is possible. When you stop expecting, you stop being a victim. You become the creator."

CHAPTER 45

The Art of Letting Go

Kannan taught the villagers the art of letting go.

"When you let go of the outcome," he said, "you free your mind. You free your heart. You free your soul. You become peaceful. You become purposeful. You become powerful."

"How do we let go?" they asked.

1 Recognize what you can and cannot control.

"First, recognize that the outcome is not in your control," he said. "You can only control your actions. You cannot control the result."

2 Trust the wisdom of the universe.

"Second, accept that the universe is wise. It knows what is best for you. It knows what you need. It knows what you deserve."

3 Believe in your inner strength.

"Third, trust that whatever happens, you will be able to handle it. You have inner strength. You have inner wisdom. You have inner power."

The villagers listened. They began to understand. They began to practice the art of letting go. And gradually, they began to feel lighter, freer, more at peace.

CHAPTER 46

Leave It to the Universe

That evening, Kannan climbed to the top of the hill overlooking Pazhayur. The sun was setting, painting the world in shades of gold and red. He thought about Krishna's teaching.

He realized that the law of karma was not a chain that bound him. It was a guide. It told him that his actions would have consequences. But it did not tell him what those consequences would be. Only the universe knew that.

So he decided to do his part. He would act. He would make choices. He would take responsibility. But he would leave the outcome to the universe.

And in that moment, Kannan felt a great weight lift from his shoulders. He had been carrying the burden of expectation. He had been carrying the burden of outcome. He had been carrying the burden of control. But now, he let it go.

CHAPTER 47

The Prayer of Surrender

Kannan composed a prayer. It was simple. It was direct.
It was powerful.

"O Universe," he prayed,
"I do not know what is best for me.
I do not know what I need.
I do not know what I deserve.
So I leave it to you.
I do my work. I make my choices.
I take my actions.
But I leave the outcome to you.
I surrender. I trust. I let go."

He shared the prayer with the villagers. They began to recite it every day.
And as they recited it, they felt their expectations dissolve. They felt their fears fade.
They felt their peace return.

PART SIX

FROM KARMA TO DHARMA

CHAPTER 48

The Five Intelligences

Kannan's grandmother, Amirthavalli, was old and wise. She had lived through many changes. One evening, she sat him down and told him about the five intelligences.

"These are the five intelligences of the human mind," she said. "They are the intellect, the ego, the memory, the mind, and the senses. For most people, these are all they use."

"What is wrong with that?" Kannan asked.

"Nothing, my child. But these five intelligences are the victim mode. They are the villain mode. When you use only these five intelligences, you become a karma villain. The consequence, the pain, the conditioning, the pattern — they will not leave you."

"So what should I do?" Kannan asked.

"You must open to the sixth and seventh intelligences," she said. "The intelligence of love. The intelligence of surrender. These are the Andava intelligences. They take you from karma path to dharma path."

CHAPTER 49

The Karma Villain

Kannan thought about the villagers. He thought about how they operated from the five intelligences.

They used their intellect to complain.

"The world is against me," they said. "I cannot succeed."

They used their ego to blame.

"It's the landlord's fault," they said. "It's the government's fault. It's my family's fault."

They used their memory to hold grudges.

"He wronged me ten years ago," they said. "I will never forgive him."

They used their mind to worry.

"What will happen tomorrow?" they asked. "What if I fail? What if I suffer?"

They used their senses to seek pleasure.

"I need more," they said. "I need better. I need different."

And what did it get them? Nothing. They were victims. They were villains — not evil villains, but victims of their own conditioning.

"From that villain," Kannan said to himself, "this villain comes. The consequence for that, the pain in that, the conditioning in that, the pattern in that — will not leave them."

He realized that he had to leave these five intelligences behind. He had to move to the sixth and seventh intelligences. He had to move from karma path to dharma path.

CHAPTER 50

The Sixth and Seventh Doors

The next day, Kannan went to the temple, The carving of Shiva as Nataraja was still there, covered in dust. But Kannan saw something new in the carving. He saw the six arms of the Lord. He saw the seven hands.

“The first five arms are the five intelligences,” he said to himself. “They are the victim mode. They are the villain mode. But the sixth and seventh arms are the doors to liberation.”

He brushed the dust off the carving. He saw the expression on the Lord’s face more clearly. It was peaceful. Purposeful. Powerful.

“I will open to the sixth intelligence,” Kannan said. “I will open to the seventh intelligence. I will leave these five intelligences behind. I will move from the sixth and seventh intelligences. From karma path, I will move to dharma path.”

CHAPTER 51

The Path of Dharma

Kannan studied the concept of dharma. It was a complex concept. It had many meanings. But at its core, it meant one thing: doing what is right, regardless of the outcome.

"Dharma path," Kannan's grandmother said, "is the path of victory. It is the path of Andava. When you walk the path of dharma, you do not worry about the outcome. You do your duty. You act with integrity. You act with compassion. You act with courage. And you leave the result to the universe."

Kannan understood. The path of dharma was not the path of victimhood. It was the path of power. It was the path of peace. It was the path of purpose.

CHAPTER 52

The Dharma Warrior

Kannan learned about the concept of the dharma warrior. The dharma warrior was not a violent person. He or she was not an aggressor. He or she was not a conqueror.

The dharma warrior was someone who fought for what was right. He or she fought against injustice. He or she fought against oppression. He or she fought against ignorance.

But the dharma warrior did not fight for victory. He or she fought because it was the right thing to do. He or she did not expect a reward. He or she did not fear defeat. He or she acted. And he or she left the outcome to the universe.

"The dharma warrior is Andava," Kannan said. "He is peaceful, purposeful, powerful. He is the creator of his own world. He is not a victim of his choices. He is not a victim of his expectations. He is the creator."

CHAPTER 53

The Battle Within

Kannan realized that the greatest battle was not fought on any battlefield. It was fought within.

The battle was between the five intelligences and the two higher intelligences. The battle was between the victim mode and the victory mode. The battle was between Tandava and Andava.

"Switching over from victim mode to victory mode," Kannan said, "is switching over from the human space to Andava space. It is switching over from karma path to dharma path. It is switching over from suffering to bliss."

He felt the battle within himself. He felt the pull of his conditioning. He felt the pull of his programming. He felt the pull of his expectations. But he also felt the pull of his higher self. He also felt the pull of his purpose. He also felt the pull of his power.

"I will fight this battle," he said. "I will win this battle. I will become Andava."

CHAPTER 54

The Victory of the Self

Kannan fought the battle within. He fought against his conditioning. He fought against his programming. He fought against his expectations.

And he won.

He became peaceful. He became purposeful. He became powerful. He became Andava.

"I am the creator of this world," he said. "I am not a victim of circumstances. I am the creator of my own life. I am the one who causes. I am the one who chooses. I am the one who acts. The effect will not have a choice."

The victory was not external. It was internal. The victory was not over anyone else. It was over himself. The victory was not of the world. It was of the self.

And in that victory, Kannan found true peace. True purpose. True power.

CHAPTER 55

The Teaching of the Grandmother

Mirthavalli, the grandmother, gathered the villagers together for one final teaching.

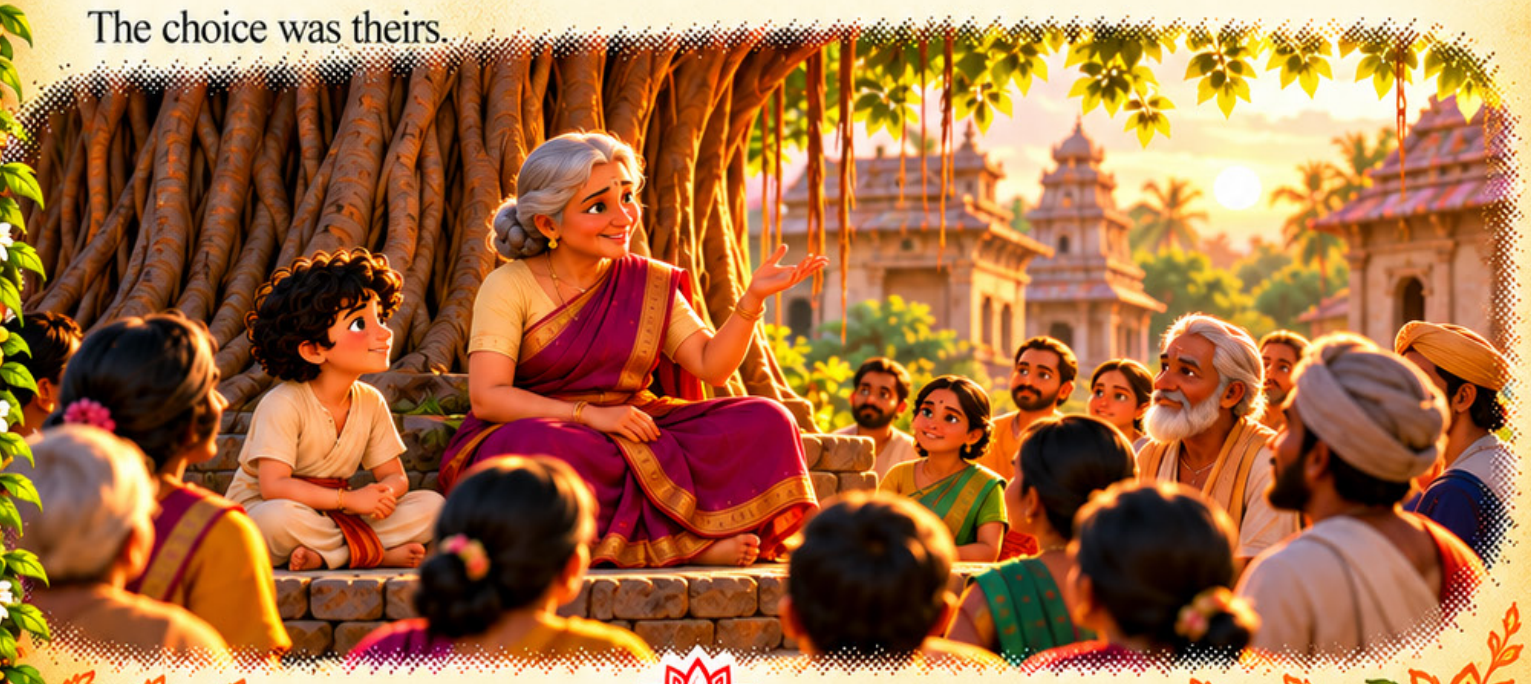
"Listen to me," she said. "I have lived for ninety-two years. I have seen many things. I have seen joy and sorrow. I have seen abundance and scarcity. I have seen love and hatred. I have seen life and death."

"And in all these years," she continued, "I have learned one thing: the only thing that matters is your state of being. Your state of being is more important than your circumstances. Your state of being is more important than your possessions. Your state of being is more important than your relationships."

"If you are peaceful, purposeful, powerful," she said, "then you are Andava. Then you are victorious. Then you are the creator. Nothing else matters."

The villagers listened. They understood. They had been victims for too long. But now, they had a choice. They could stay in victim mode, or they could switch to victory mode. They could stay in Tandava, or they could move to Andava.

The choice was theirs.



PART SEVEN

THE PANDAVA STATE

CHAPTER 56

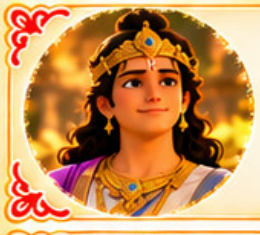
The Five Brothers

The Pandavas were five brothers, each with a unique strength. Together, they were invincible. Together, they were Pandava.

Yudhishthira was the king, the embodiment of truth. He always spoke the truth. He always acted with integrity. He always did what was right, regardless of the consequences.

Bhima was the warrior, the embodiment of strength. He was powerful beyond measure. He could defeat any enemy. He could overcome any obstacle. He could achieve any goal.

Arjuna was the archer, the embodiment of focus. He could concentrate completely on his target. He could see the goal. He could hit the bullseye every time. He never missed.



Nakula was the beauty, the embodiment of grace. He was graceful in everything he did. He moved with ease. He spoke with eloquence. He lived with elegance.

Sahadeva was the scholar, the embodiment of wisdom. He knew all the scriptures. He understood the mysteries of existence. He could teach others. He could guide others. He could inspire others.

Together, they were invincible. Together, they were Pandava.

CHAPTER 57

Yudhisthira - The King of Truth

Yudhishthira was the eldest of the Pandavas. He was the rightful king of the kingdom of Indraprastha. He was a just ruler. He was a fair ruler. He was a compassionate ruler.

But Yudhisthira was also a man of truth. He never lied. He never deceived. He never betrayed. His word was his bond. His honor was his life.

One day, Yudhisthira was faced with a terrible dilemma. He was playing a game of dice with his cousin, Duryodhana. The game was rigged. Duryodhana had cheated. But Yudhishthira could not prove it. He had to accept his loss.

"I have lost everything," Yudhishthira said. "My kingdom. My wealth. My brothers. My wife. Everything. I am a victim of the game."

But his wife, Draupadi, said to him, "You are not a victim. You are the creator. You choose to play the game. You choose to accept the rules. You choose to stake your possessions. You are not a victim of circumstances. You are the victim of your choices."

CHAPTER 58

Bhima - The Warrior of Strength

Bhima was the second of the Pandavas. He was the strongest warrior in the world. He could defeat any opponent. He could overcome any obstacle. He could achieve any goal.

But Bhima was also quick to anger. He was impulsive. He was reckless. He acted without thinking.

One day, Bhima wanted to kill his cousin, Duryodhana. He wanted to avenge the wrongs that had been done to his family. He wanted to use his strength to destroy his enemy.

But his brother, Yudhishthira, said to him, "Bhima, you cannot act out of anger. You cannot act out of revenge. You must act out of dharma. You must act out of duty. You must act out of righteousness."

"But I am powerful," Bhima said. "I can destroy my enemy. I can get what I want. I can achieve my goal."

"That is not the path of dharma," Yudhishhira said. "That is the path of karma. The path of karma is the path of victimhood. The path of dharma is the path of victory. You must choose the path of victory. You must become Andava."

CHAPTER 59

Arjuna - The Archer of Focus

Arjuna was the third of the Pandavas. He was the greatest archer in the world. He could hit any target. He could focus completely on his goal. He never missed.

But Arjuna was also filled with doubt. He questioned himself. He questioned his actions. He questioned his purpose.

On the battlefield of Kurukshetra, Arjuna was filled with despair. "I cannot fight," he said. "I cannot kill my own family. I cannot kill my own teachers. I cannot kill my own friends. I cannot win a kingdom through bloodshed."

But his charioteer, Krishna, said to him, "Arjuna, you are not a victim of your doubts. You are the creator of your own actions. You must do your duty. You must fight. You must act. Leave the outcome to me."

Arjuna trusted Krishna. He fought. He acted. He did his duty. And he won the war. He achieved victory.

CHAPTER 60

Nakula - The Beauty of Grace

Nakula was the fourth of the Pandavas. He was the most beautiful of all the brothers. He was graceful in everything he did. He moved with ease. He spoke with eloquence. He lived with elegance.

But Nakula was also insecure. He compared himself to his brothers. He felt inferior. He felt unworthy.

"Why am I not as strong as Bhima?" he asked. "Why am I not as focused as Arjuna? Why am I not as wise as Sahadeva? Why am I not as truthful as Yudhistlhira?"

His mother, Kunti, said to him, "Nakula, you are not a victim of your insecurities. You are the creator of your own identity. You are beautiful. You are graceful. You are elegant. You have your own strengths. You have your own purpose. You have your own power."

Nakula understood. He stopped comparing himself to others. He accepted himself as he was. He embraced his own strengths. And he became Andava.

CHAPTER 61

Sahadeva - The Scholar of Wisdom

Sahadeva was the youngest of the Pandavas. He was the wisest of all the brothers. He knew all the scriptures. He understood the mysteries of existence. He could teach others. He could guide others. He could inspire others.

But Sahadeva was also afraid of the future. He had visions of the war. He saw the destruction. He saw the suffering. He saw the death.

"The war will destroy everything," he said. "It will kill our family. It will kill our friends. It will destroy our kingdom. I am a victim of this prophecy."

His brother, Yudhishthira, said to him, "Sahadeva, you are not a victim of your visions. You are the creator of your own destiny. You have wisdom. You have knowledge. You have understanding. Use your wisdom to guide us. Use your knowledge to help us. Use your understanding to save us."

Sahadeva understood. He used his wisdom to guide his brothers. He used his knowledge to help his family. He used his understanding to save his kingdom. And he became Andava.

CHAPTER 62

The Brotherhood

The five brothers were different. They had different strengths. They had different weaknesses. They had different personalities. They had different purposes.

But they were united. They were one. They were Pandava.

Their unity was their strength. Their unity was their power. Their unity was their victory.

"Alone, we are vulnerable," Yudhishthira said. "Together, we are invincible. Alone, we are victims. Together, we are creators. Alone, we are Tandava. Together, we are Andava."

Kannan thought about the five brothers. He thought about the five intelligences. He thought about the five villagers. He thought about the five aspects of his own being.

"I must unite myself," he said. "I must unite my peace, my purpose, my power. I must unite my intelligences. I must unite my actions. I must become Pandava."

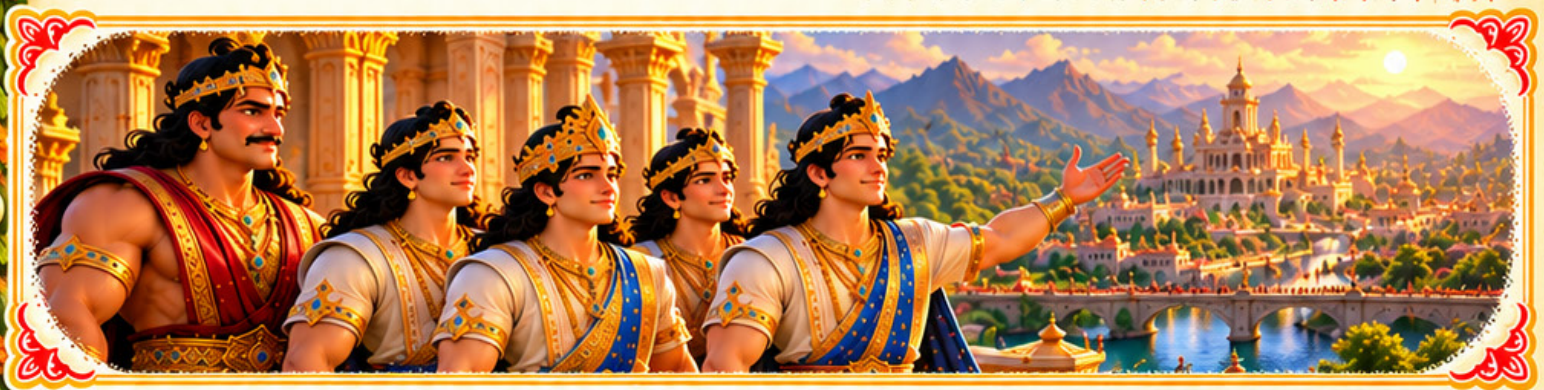
CHAPTER 63

The Kingdom of Indraprastha

The Pandavas built a magnificent kingdom. It was called Indraprastha. It was the most beautiful kingdom in the world. It was the most prosperous kingdom in the world. It was the most peaceful kingdom in the world.

But the kingdom was not built by luck. It was built by effort. It was built by sacrifice. It was built by duty.

The Pandavas worked hard. They made wise decisions. They treated their subjects with compassion. They ruled with justice.



And because of their efforts, their kingdom prospered. Because of their wisdom, their kingdom flourished. Because of their compassion, their kingdom was loved. Because of their justice, their kingdom was respected.

CHAPTER 64

The Game of Dice

But then, the game of dice happened. Duryodhana, the cousin of the Pandavas, challenged Yudhisthira to a game of dice. The game was rigged. Duryodhana had cheated. Yudhisthira lost everything.

"I have lost my kingdom," Yudhisthira said. "I have lost my wealth. I have lost my brothers. I have lost my wife. I have lost everything. I am a victim."

But his brothers did not despair. They knew that they were not victims. They knew that they were creators. They knew that they could rebuild. They knew that they could recover.

"We will regain our kingdom," Bhima said. "We will restore our honor. We will defeat our enemy. We will become victorious. We are not victims. We are creators."

CHAPTER 65

The Exile in the Forest

The Pandavas were exiled to the forest for thirteen years. They lost everything. Their kingdom. Their wealth. Their power. Their pride.

But they did not lose their peace. They did not lose their purpose. They did not lose their power. They remained Andava.

In the forest, they lived simply. They hunted for food. They gathered for shelter. They studied the scriptures. They meditated on the divine.

"We have lost the outer picture," Yudhistthira said. "But we have kept the inner truth. We have lost our kingdom. But we have kept our peace. We have lost our wealth. But we have kept our purpose. We have lost our power. But we have kept our strength."

CHAPTER 66

The War of Kurukshetra

After thirteen years, the Pandavas returned. They asked for their kingdom back. Duryodhana refused. The war of Kurukshetra began.

The war was terrible. It was bloody. It was destructive. It killed millions. It destroyed families. It devastated the land.

But the Pandavas fought. They did not fight out of anger. They did not fight out of revenge. They fought out of duty. They fought out of righteousness. They fought out of dharma.

Arjuna was the commander. He was the greatest archer in the world. He fought with all his strength. He fought with all his focus. He fought with all his skill.

But Arjuna also had doubts. “I cannot fight,” he said. “I cannot kill my own family. I cannot kill my own teachers. I cannot kill my own friends.”

Krishna, his charioteer, said to him, “Arjuna, you are not a victim of your doubts. You are the creator of your own actions. You must do your duty. You must fight. You must act. Leave the outcome to me.”

Arjuna trusted Krishna. He fought. He acted. He did his duty. And he won the war. He achieved victory.

CHAPTER 67

The Victory

The Pandavas won the war. They regained their kingdom. They restored their honor. They became victorious.

But they did not become arrogant. They did not become proud. They did not become cruel. They remained humble. They remained grateful. They remained peaceful.

"We have won the war," Yudhisthira said. "But we have not won the peace.
We have regained our kingdom. But we have not regained our souls.
We have achieved victory. But we have not achieved enlightenment.
We are victorious. But we are not yet Andava."

And so, the Pandavas continued their journey. They continued to learn. They continued to grow. They continued to evolve. They continued to become more peaceful, more purposeful, more powerful.

CHAPTER 68

Peaceful, Purposeful, Powerful

Kannan began to practice the three P's.

Peaceful. He stopped worrying about the future. He stopped regretting the past. He accepted the present as it was. He became peaceful.

Purposeful. He asked himself, "Why was I born? What am I doing? What is my purpose?" He found the answers not in the words of others, but in his own heart. He became purposeful.

Powerful. He stopped giving power to others. He stopped believing that the world was powerful and he was powerless. He took responsibility for his actions. He became powerful.

And when he was peaceful, purposeful, and powerful, he felt something shift inside him. He felt the Andava state. He felt the all-possibility zone opening before him.

CHAPTER 69

The All-Possibility Zone

Kannan began to practice the three P's.

Peaceful. He stopped worrying about the future. He stopped regretting the past. He accepted the present as it was. He became peaceful.

Purposeful. He asked himself, "Why was I born? What am I doing? What is my purpose?" He found the answers not in the words of others, but in his own heart. He became purposeful.

Powerful. He stopped giving power to others. He stopped believing that the world was powerful and he was powerless. He took responsibility for his actions. He became powerful.

And when he was peaceful, purposeful, and powerful, he felt something shift inside him. He felt the Andava state. He felt the all-possibility zone opening before him.

"When you enter the all-possibility zone," a voice said,
"you can choose the positive possibility which you want.
The cause is always there. You are causing every day.
The effect will not have a choice."

CHAPTER 70

Becoming Pandava

Kannan went to the village square and spoke to the villagers.

"Functioning from a peaceless, powerless, purposeless life — to a peaceful, purposeful, powerful life — is what Pandava is. The P stands for peaceful, purposeful, powerful, all possible. Pandava state. All possible Pandava state."

The villagers were silent. They did not understand.

"Close your eyes," Kannan said. "Sit straight. Recollect everything. Deepen this reasoning. Take it to the core of your being."

The villagers closed their eyes.

And something shifted in the village of Pazhayur.

PART EIGHT:
THE CONDITIONED MIND

CHAPTER 71

The Boiling Milk

Kannan's grandmother loved to tell stories. One day, she told him the story of the boiling milk.

"If you boil milk and then drink it," she said, "what will you say?"

"I will say, 'No, I don't want milk. It is too hot. It will hurt me. It is pain for me. I should avoid it,'" Kannan replied.

"Yes," she said. "Your experience gives you a conclusion and a judgement. Your experience is painful and hurting. Your experience tells you to avoid it. But if you boil milk daily, it will give you energy."

"So what is the truth?" Kannan asked.

"The truth is that the milk is the same," she said. "The difference is your conditioning. Your experience has conditioned you to avoid milk. But in a natural state, if you connect your world and your life, you will see a different natural state. If you look at the world in that condition, it will change."

CHAPTER 72

The Story of the Heated Water

Kannan's grandmother told him another story. The story of the heated water.

"Once there was a pot of water," she said. "The water was cold. Then it was heated. It became hot. Then it was boiled. It became steam."

"What is the point of the story?" Kannan asked.

"The point is that the water was the same," she said. "It changed because of the conditions. It changed because of the heat. But the water was never damaged. It was never destroyed. It was never lost. It simply changed form."

"Your mind is like water," she continued. "It changes with the conditions. It changes with the heat of life. It changes with the challenges you face. But you are not damaged. You are not destroyed. You are not lost. You simply change form. You simply change state. You simply become Andava."

CHAPTER 73

One Man's Food, Another Man's Poison

The villagers of Pazhayur had many opinions about food.

"One man's food is another man's poison," Kannan's grandmother said. "One man's poison is another man's delicacy. If you like it, it is poison. If you don't like it, it is a delicacy."

Kannan thought about this. He remembered how his mother hated kothu parotta while his father loved it. He remembered how his friend refused to eat paneer while his sister couldn't get enough of it.

"So that is our conditioned mind," he realized. "For the conditioned mind, the effect is all good. The snake is a snake. That is the cause. What effect does it have on you? Does it give you fear? Fear. Snake. Nagaraja. Does it give you devotion? Devotion."

The cause was the same.
The effect was different.
The difference was conditioning.

CHAPTER 74

The Feast of Many Tastes

Kannan organized a feast in the village. He invited everyone. He prepared many dishes.

Some people loved the sambar. Others did not. Some people loved the rasam. Others did not. Some people loved the payasam. Others did not. Some people loved the vadai. Others did not. Some people loved the idli. Others did not.

"Why do people have different preferences?" Kannan asked.

"Because of conditioning," his grandmother said. "Conditioning creates preferences. Preferences create likes and dislikes. Likes and dislikes create suffering."

"How?" Kannan asked.

"When you like something," she said, "you want more of it. When you don't get it, you suffer. When you dislike something, you want to avoid it. When you cannot avoid it, you suffer."

Your likes and dislikes make you a victim.
They make you a slave to your preferences.
They make you Tandava."

CHAPTER 75

The Snake and the Serpent Lord

There was a snake in the village. For most villagers, it was a source of fear. They ran away from it. They threw stones at it. They killed it.

But for Kannan's grandmother, the snake was Nagaraja — the Serpent Lord. She prayed to it. She offered it milk. She worshipped it.

"The cause is the same," Kannan said to himself. "The snake is a snake. But the effect depends on the conditioned mind. For the conditioned mind, the effect is fear. For the devoted mind, the effect is devotion."

He understood that his conditioning was not who he was. It was something that had been given to him by the world. But he could change his conditioning. He could choose his effect. He could choose fear or devotion. He could choose victim or victor.

CHAPTER 76

The Fear and the Devotion

Kannan thought about the snake. He thought about how the same creature could produce two different effects in two different people.

"For most people, the snake produces fear," he said. "For my grandmother, the snake produces devotion. The cause is the same. The effect is different. The difference is conditioning."

He thought about his own life. He thought about how the same situation could produce different effects in different people. Some people would see a challenge as a threat. Others would see it as an opportunity. Some people would see a failure as a defeat. Others would see it as a lesson. Some people would see a loss as a tragedy. Others would see it as a release.

"The difference is conditioning," he said. "The difference is my state of mind. The difference is my state of being. The difference is whether I am Tandava or Andava."

CHAPTER 77

The Illusion of Like and Dislike

Kannan began to examine his own likes and dislikes. He realized that many of them were not his own. They had been given to him by his family, his village, his culture, his society.

"I like what I was told to like," he said. "I dislike what I was told to dislike. My likes and dislikes are not my own. They are conditioned. They are programmed. They are illusions."

He decided to let go of his likes and dislikes. He decided to be neutral. He decided to be open. He decided to be free.

"Snake is a snake," he said. "That is the cause. The effect is up to me. I can choose fear. Or I can choose devotion. I can choose Tandava. Or I can choose Andava. The choice is mine."

CHAPTER 78

The Conditioned State

Kannan understood that the conditioned state was the state of victimhood. The conditioned state was Tandava. The conditioned state was the dance of suffering.

"The conditioned state is not our natural state," he said. "It is a state that has been given to us. It is a state that thas been imposed upon us. It is a state that we have accepted without question."

He thought about his own conditioning. He thought about the programming he had received from his family, his village, his culture, his society.

"I am not what I have been conditioned to be," he said. "I am what I choose to be. I am the creator of my own being. I am the cause of my own effect. I am Andava."

CHAPTER 79

The Natural State

Kannan sat under the kalampu tree. The tree was dead, but he did not mourn it. He understood that the tree was not the source of the village's power. The villagers were.

He thought about being in a godly state. He thought about functioning from a godly state.

"Being in a godly state and functioning from a godly state," he said, "is as natural as somebody born in Tamil Nadu speaking Tamil. Somebody born in Jaipur speaking Japanese. That is the natural. That is your natural, immediate state."

He realized that his natural state was the Andava state. It was the state of peace, purpose, and power. It was the state of the creator. It was the state of victory.

He was not a victim. He was Andava.

CHAPTER 80

Returning Home

Kannan returned to his grandmother.
He told her everything he had learned.

"Amma," he said, "I understand now. I understand the two dances. I understand the victim mode. I understand the four consequences. I understand the law of karma. I understand the teaching of Krishna. I understand the five intelligences. I understand the path of dharma. I understand the Pandava state. I understand the conditioned mind. I understand the natural state."

His grandmother smiled. "You have learned well, my child," she said. "But learning is not enough. You must practice. You must live. You must become. You must be."

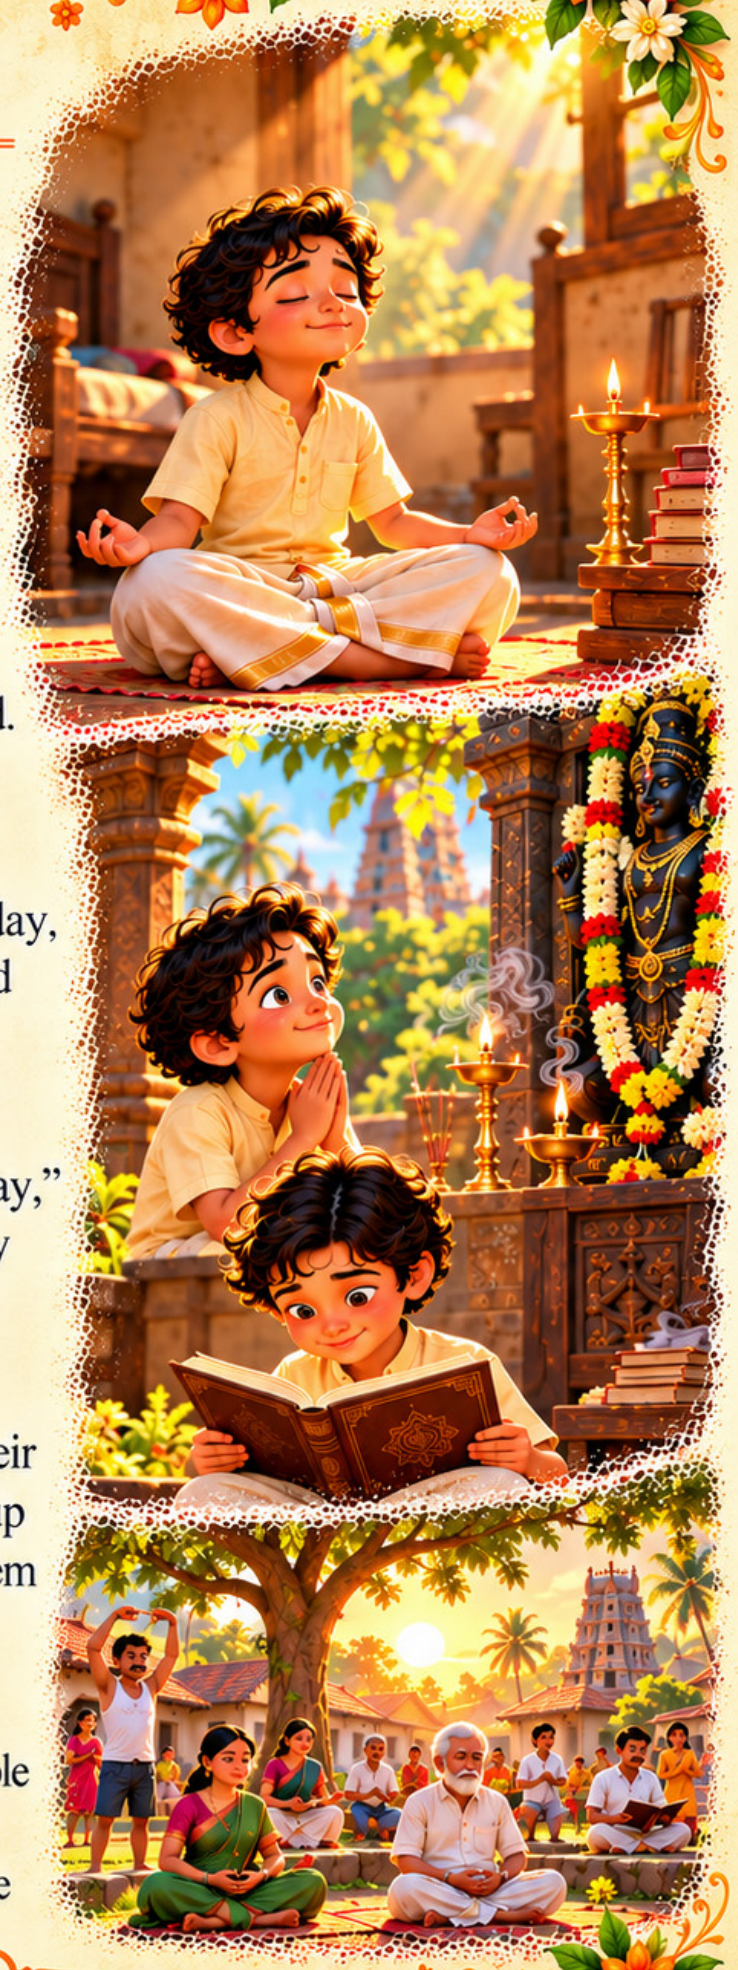
"I will," Kannan said.

And he did.

PART NINE:
APPLICATIONS AND PRACTICES

CHAPTER 81

Morning Rituals



Kannan began each day with a morning ritual. He woke up before the sun. He bathed. He performed puja at the temple. He meditated. He read the scriptures.

The morning ritual set the tone for the day, It reminded him of his purpose. It reminded him of his power. It reminded him of his peace.

"The morning is the foundation of the day," he said. "If the foundation is strong, the day will be strong. If the foundation is weak, the day will be weak."

He encouraged the villagers to create their own morning rituals. Some of them woke up early. Some of them meditated. Some of them prayed. Some of them read. Some of them exercised.

And the village began to change. The people became calmer. They became more focused. They became more productive. They became more peaceful.

CHAPTER 82

The Practice of Peace

Kannan practiced peace. He did not let the world disturb his peace. He did not let the world rob his peace. He did not let the world steal his peace.

Whenever he felt his peace being disturbed, he took a deep breath. He reminded himself that he was the creator. He reminded himself that he was the cause. He reminded himself that he had a choice.

“I choose peace,” he said. “I choose calmness. I choose tranquility. I choose serenity. I am not a victim of my circumstances. I am the creator of my peace.”

The villagers learned the practice of peace. They stopped complaining. They stopped worrying. They stopped fearing. They became peaceful.

CHAPTER 83

The Discovery of Purpose

Kannan discovered his purpose.
He was born to teach. He was born to guide. He was born to inspire.
He was born to lead.

He did not discover his purpose from others. He discovered it from within. He listened to his heart. He listened to his soul. He listened to his innermost being.

"Why was I born?" he asked himself. "What am I doing? What is my purpose?"

The answers came not from the words of others, but from his own heart.
He was born to awaken others.
He was born to liberate others.
He was born to help others find their own purpose.

CHAPTER 84

The Cultivation of Power

Kannan cultivated power. He did not seek power over others. He sought power over himself. He sought the power to act. He sought the power to choose. He sought the power to create.

He realized that true power was not external. It was internal. True power was not about controlling others. It was about controlling oneself. True power was not about dominating the world. It was about dominating one's own mind.

"I am powerful," he said. "Not because I can control others. But because I can control myself. Not because I can dominate the world. But because I can dominate my own mind. Not because I can get what I want. But because I can want what I get."

CHAPTER 85

The Art of Non-Attachment

Kannan practiced the art of non-attachment. He did not attach himself to outcomes. He did not attach himself to results. He did not attach himself to consequences.

He acted. He made choices. He took responsibility. But he did not attach himself to the outcome. He left the outcome to the universe.

"I act," he said. "But I do not attach myself to the result. I do my work. But I do not attach myself to the reward. I make my choices. But I do not attach myself to the consequence."

CHAPTER 86

The Discipline of Action

Kannan practiced the discipline of action. He acted with intention. He acted with purpose. He acted with integrity.

He did not act out of laziness. He did not act out of fear. He did not act out of anger. He did not act out of greed. He acted out of duty. He acted out of dharma. He acted out of love.

“I act,” he said. “Not because I expect a reward. Not because I fear punishment. But because it is my duty. Because it is my dharma. Because it is my purpose.”

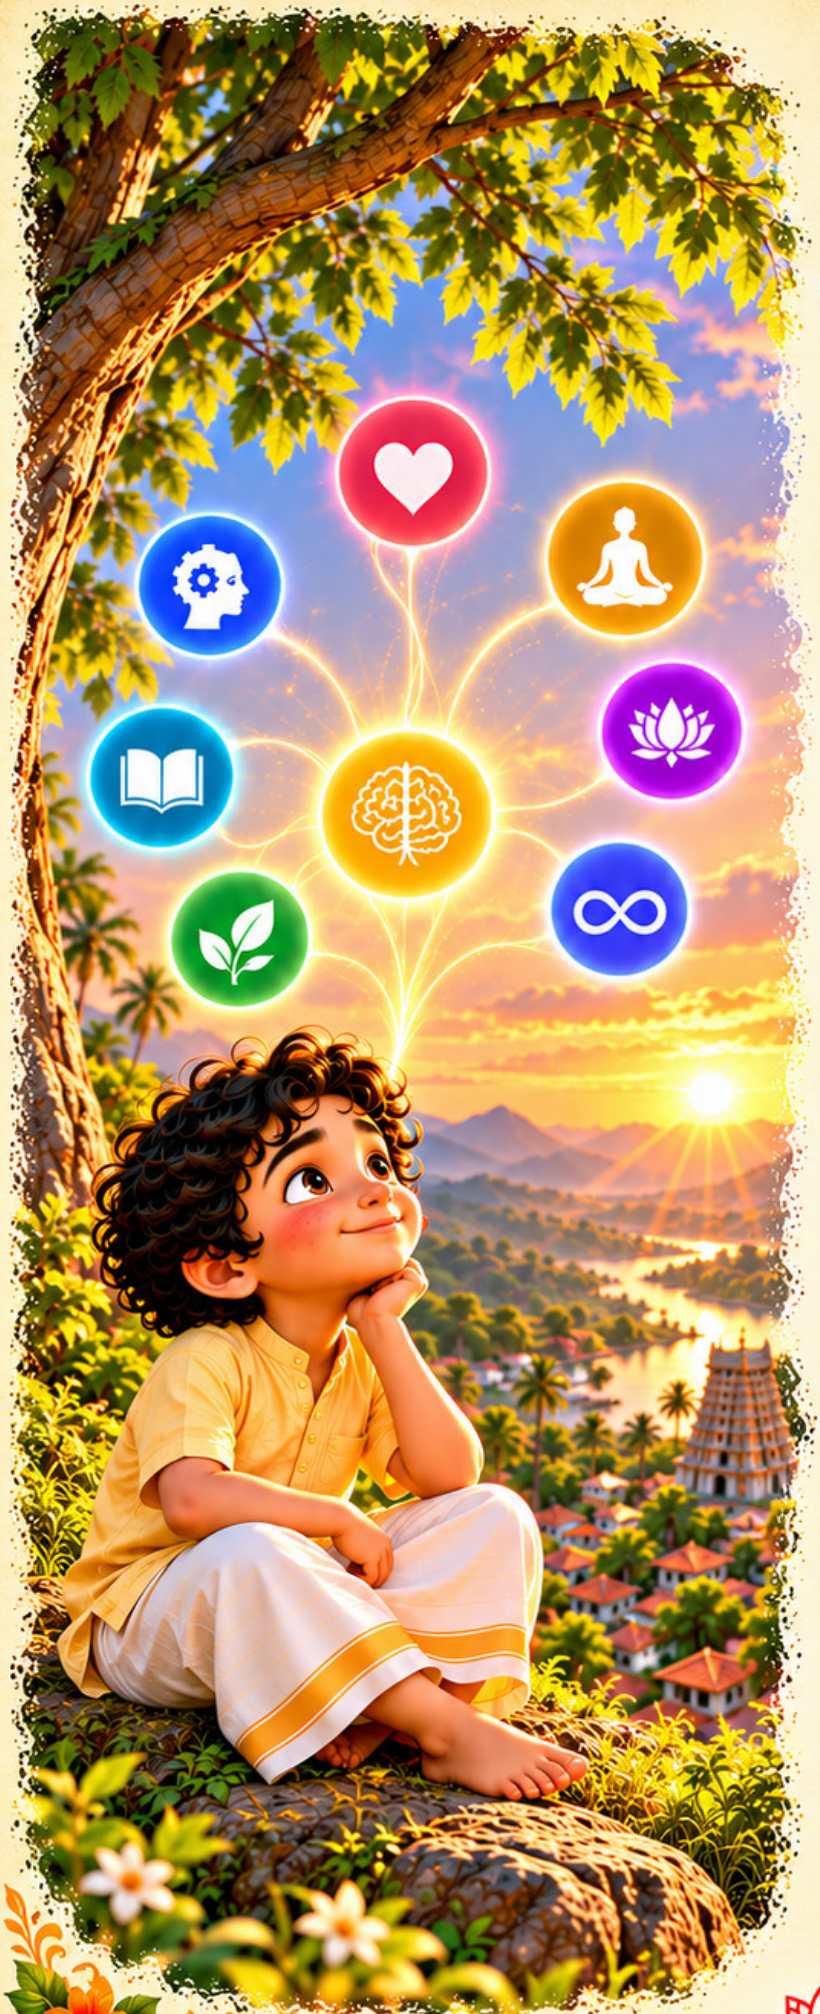
CHAPTER 87

The Surrender of Outcome

Kannan practiced the surrender of outcome. He let go of his expectations. He let go of his desires. He let go of his attachments.

"I surrender," he said. "I surrender to the universe. I surrender to existence. I surrender to God. I trust. I let go. I am free."

The surrender was not a sign of weakness. It was a sign of strength. It was a sign of trust. It was a sign of faith. It was a sign of Andava.



CHAPTER 88

The Integration of Intelligences

Kannan integrated his intelligences. He did not rely only on the five lower intelligences. He opened to the six and seventh intelligences. He opened to love. He opened to surrender.

"The five intelligences are the victim mode," he said. "The sixth and seventh intelligences are the victory mode. I choose the victory mode. I choose love. I choose surrender. I choose Andava."

The integration was not easy. It required practice. It required discipline. It required patience. But Kannan persisted. He practiced every day. And gradually, he became more integrated. He became more whole. He became more Andava.

CHAPTER 89

The Practice of Detachment

Kannan practiced detachment. He detached himself from the opinions of others. He detached himself from the judgments of others. He detached himself from the expectations of others.

"I am not what others think of me," he said. "I am what I think of myself. I am not what others expect of me. I am what I expect of myself. I am not what others want me to be. I am what I want to be."

The practice of detachment was liberating. It freed him from the bondage of social expectations. It freed him from the burden of others' opinions. It freed him from the weight of others' judgments.

CHAPTER 90

The Path of Mastery

Kannan walked the path of mastery. He practiced every day. He learned every day. He grew every day.

"I am a student of life," he said. "I am learning every moment. I am growing every moment. I am evolving every moment. I am becoming more peaceful, more purposeful, more powerful every moment."

The path of mastery was not a destination. It was a journey. It was a continuous process of growth, learning, and evolution. And Kannan embraced the journey with all his heart.

EPILOGUE: BECOMING PROFESSIONAL

CHAPTER 91

The Final Teaching

Kannan's grandmother, Amirthavalli, was reaching the end of her life. She had lived for ninety-two years. She had seen many things. She had taught many people. She had shared her wisdom with the world.

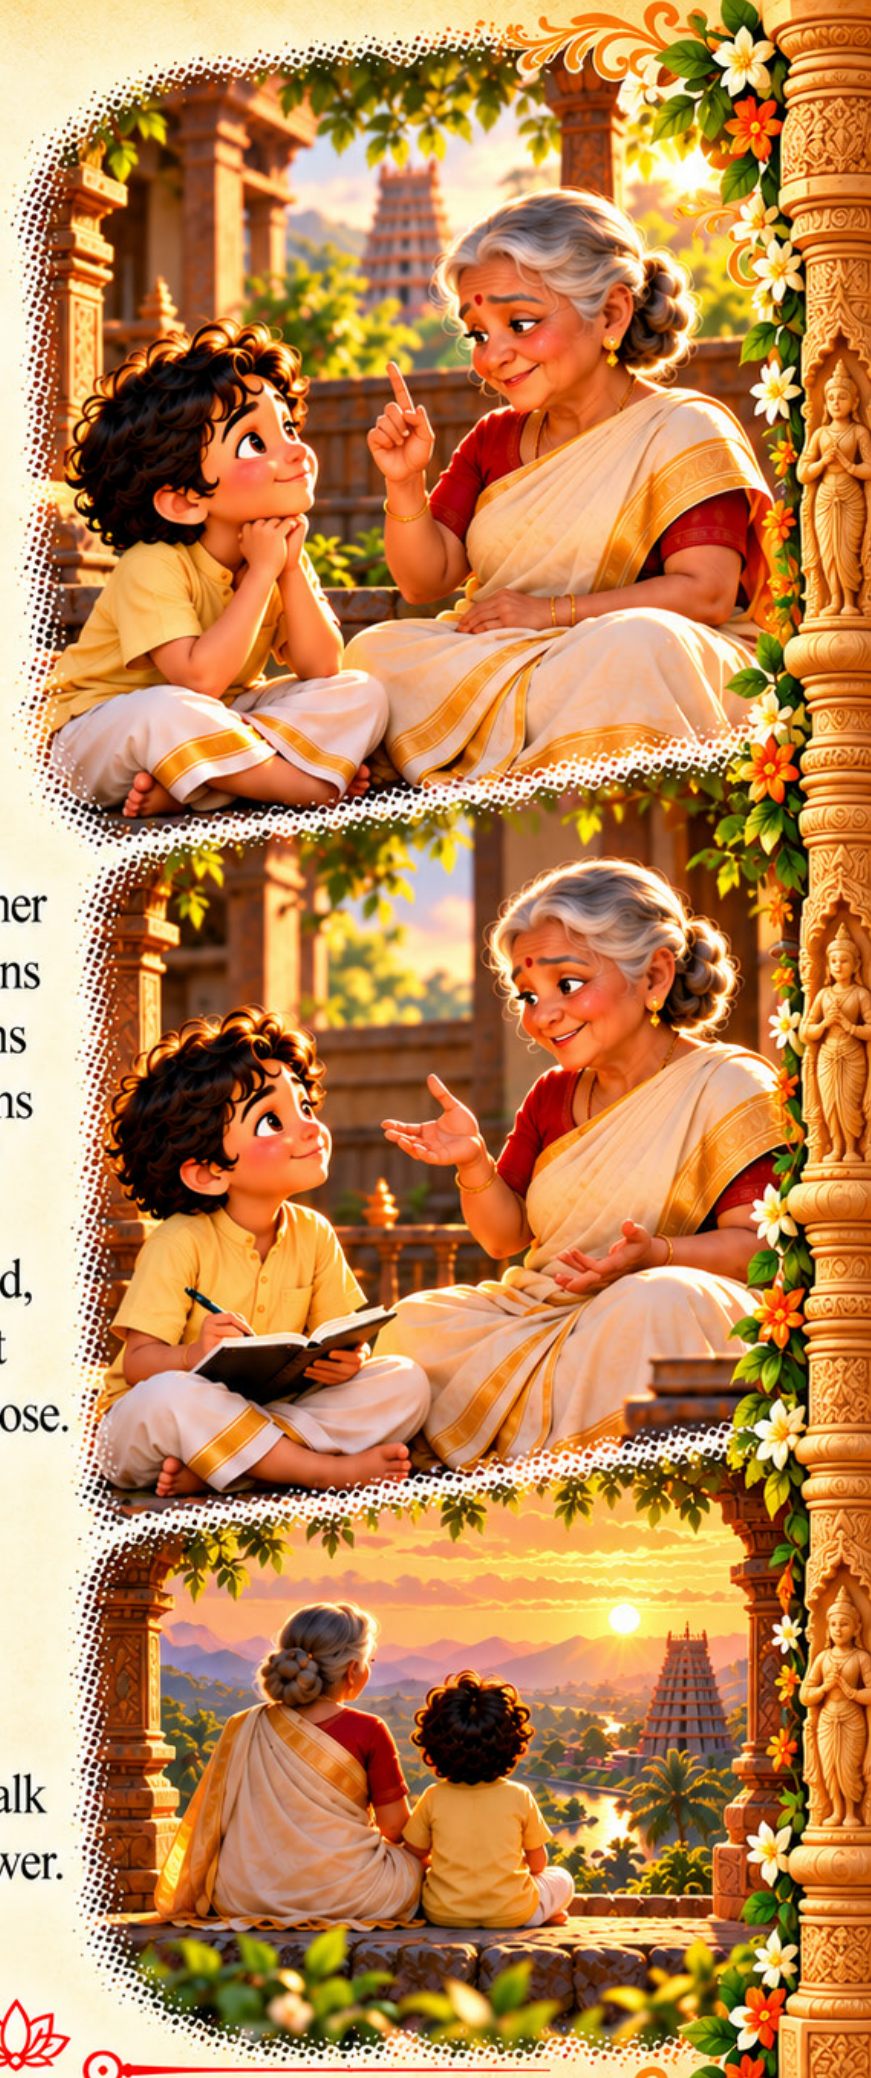
One day, she called Kannan to her side.

"Kannan," she said, "I have taught you everything I know. I have taught you about the two dances. I have taught you about the victim mode. I have taught you about the four consequences. I have taught you about the law of karma. I have taught you about the teaching of Krishna. I have taught you about the five intelligences. I have taught you about the path of dharma. I have taught you about the Pandava state. I have taught you about the conditioned mind. I have taught you about the natural state."

"Now," she continued, "I have one final teaching for you. It is the teaching of the professional."

CHAPTER 92

The Mastery of Life



"What does it mean to be a professional?" Kannan asked.

"To be a professional," his grandmother said, "means to master your life. It means to be in control of your actions. It means to be in control of your choices. It means to be in control of your consequences."

"To be a professional," she continued, "means to act with skill. It means to act with intention. It means to act with purpose. It means to act with mastery."

"To be a professional," she said, "means to not be a beginner. It means to not fumble in the dark. It means to not stumble through life. It means to walk with purpose. It means to walk with power. It means to walk with peace."

CHAPTER 93

Taking Photos in Angle

You can keep the soup," his grandmother said. "You can fry it. You can take photos. You can take photos in angle."

Kannan was confused. "What does that mean, Amma?"

"Professional," she said. "That is the meaning. When you are a professional, you take photos in angle. Not by accident. By mastery."

"Your life," she continued, "is like a photo. You can take it straight. Or you can take it in angle. You can take it without skill. Or you can take it with mastery. The choice is yours."

CHAPTER 94

The Professional State

Kannan understood. The professional state was the same as the Andava state. It was the state of peace, purpose, and power. It was the state of mastery. It was the state of victory.

"To be a professional," he said, "is to be Andava. It is to be peaceful, purposeful, and powerful. It is to be the creator of your own life. It is to be the cause of your own effect. It is to be the victor of your own destiny."

He realized that becoming professional was the final stage of the journey. It was the stage of mastery. It was the stage of integration. It was the stage of Andava.

CHAPTER 95

The Legacy of Pazhayur

Kannan's grandmother passed away peacefully. She had lived a full life. She had shared her wisdom. She had left her legacy.

The village of Pazhayur changed. The kalampu tree was cut down, but a new tree grew in its place — a mango tree that Vellaiyan had planted. It bore sweet fruit.

The temple was restored. The dust was swept away. The lamps were lit. And the carving of Shiva as Nataraja was worshipped once more.

And Kannan continued to teach. He traveled to other villages. He shared the wisdom of his grandmother. He shared the teachings of the Pandavas. He shared the path of Andava.

And wherever he went, people began to change. They began to become more peaceful, more purposeful, more powerful. They began to switch from victim mode to victory mode. They began to become

THE FINAL WORD

Kannan stood on the hill overlooking Pazhayur. He looked at the village below. He saw the homes. He saw the fields. He saw the temple. He saw the people.

He thought about everything he had learned. He thought about everything he had practiced. He thought about everything he had become.

He had been a victim. Now he was a victor. He had been Tandava. Now he was Andava. He had been powerless. Now he was powerful. He had been purposeless. Now he was purposeful. He had been peaceless. Now he was peaceful.

He was the creator of his own life. He was the cause of his own effect. He was the master of his own destiny.

And so are you.

Appendix A: Glossary of Tamil Terms

Amma — Mother; term of respect for an elderly woman.

Andava — State of peace, purpose, and power; the victory mode.

Ayangara — Five intelligences (intellect, ego, memory, mind, senses).

Bhagavad Gita — The Song of the Lord; a sacred Hindu text.

Damaru — The drum of creation held by Shiva as Nataraja.

Gopuram — The tower above the sanctum of a temple.

Indraprastha — The kingdom of the Pandavas.

Janma — Birth; life.

Kalampu — A type of tree used as a totem in ancient Tamil traditions.

Karma — Action; the law of cause and effect.

Kothu Parotta — A Tamil dish made of shredded flatbread.

Krishna — The eighth avatar of Vishnu; teacher of the Bhagavad Gita.

Kurukshetra — The battlefield of the Mahabharata war.

Mammy — Grandmother; elder mother.

Murasu — A royal drum used in ceremonies and to announce victory in ancient Tamil kingdoms.

Nagaraja — The Serpent Lord; a deity worshipped in Tamil tradition.

Nataraja — Shiva as the Lord of Dance.

Nilgiris — A mountain range in Tamil Nadu; Blue Mountains.

Pandava — One of the five heroic brothers in the Mahabharata; also refers to the state of peaceful, purposeful, powerful being.

Paneer — Indian cottage cheese.

Parotta — A layered flatbread.

Puja — Ritual worship.

Raghugendra — A form of Lord Vishnu.

Samyama — Self-control; restraint.

Sanjata-tattva — The principle of creation.

Shani Bhagwan — The planet Saturn; a deity.

Tandava — The dance of destruction and suffering; the victim mode

Tata — Grandfather; also a term for a powerful person.

Tuyilum Illam — Places of worship dedicated to heroic ancestors and martyrs in Tamil tradition.

Appendix B: Historical Context of the Pandavas

The Pandavas are central figures in the Mahabharata, one of the two major Sanskrit epics of ancient India. The Mahabharata narrates the struggle between two groups of cousins — the Pandavas and the Kauravas — for the throne of Hastinapura.

The five Pandava brothers are:

1. Yudhishthira — The eldest, known for his righteousness and truthfulness.
2. Bhima — The second, known for his immense strength and fierce loyalty.
3. Arjuna — The third, the greatest archer, known for his focus and skill.
4. Nakula — The fourth, known for his beauty and grace.
5. Sahadeva — The youngest, known for his wisdom and knowledge of the scriptures.

The Pandavas are often regarded as the embodiment of dharma (righteousness) and are celebrated for their perseverance, integrity, and devotion to duty. Their exile in the forest and their eventual victory in the war of Kurukshetra are among the most celebrated stories in Indian culture.

In Tamil tradition, the Pandavas are associated with the Nilgiri hills and the tribal communities of the region. The Adivasis of the Nilgiris claim descent from Bhima, and the Pandavas are revered as heroic ancestors.

Appendix C: The Philosophy of the Bhagavad Gita

The Bhagavad Gita, or "Song of the Lord," is a 700-verse Hindu scripture that is part of the Mahabharata. It consists of a conversation between Prince Arjuna and his charioteer, Lord Krishna, on the battlefield of Kurukshetra.

The Gita addresses the moral and philosophical dilemmas of Arjuna, who is filled with doubt and despair. Krishna's teachings cover a wide range of topics, including:

Karma Yoga —
The path of action. One should act without attachment to the results of the action.

Bhakti Yoga —
The path of devotion. One should surrender to the divine.

Jnana Yoga —
The path of knowledge. One should seek the truth through wisdom and understanding.

The central message of the Gita is that one should perform one's duty without attachment to the outcome. This teaching is referenced throughout the discourse and is central to the concept of moving from karma path to dharma path.

Appendix D: The Concept of Karma and Dharma

Karma — The law of cause and effect. Every action has a consequence. Karma is often understood as a cycle of action and reaction that binds individuals to the cycle of birth and death (samsara). The concept of karma emphasizes personal responsibility for one's actions.

Dharma — Righteousness, duty, and law. Dharma is the moral order that upholds the universe. It is the path of right action, regardless of the outcome. In the context of this book, dharma path represents the shift from being a victim of consequences to being a victor through righteous action.

The speaker in the discourse distinguishes between the path of karma (victim mode) and the path of dharma (victory mode). The shift from karma to dharma is the shift from being a victim of one's actions to being the creator of one's life.

Appendix E: Reflection Questions For Part One: The Two Dances

For Part One: The Two Dances

1. In which areas of your life are you experiencing the Tandava — peacelessness, purposelessness, powerlessness?

2. What would it feel like to enter the Andava — to be peaceful, purposeful, and powerful?

3. Who or what do you believe is "more powerful" than you? How can you reclaim that power?

For Part Two: The Victim Mode

4. What programming have you inherited from your family, culture, or society that keeps you in victim mode?

5. Have you ever felt that you are a victim of circumstances? What would change if you saw yourself as the creator instead?

6. The speaker says, "The world is designed to rob my peace." Do you agree? Why or why not?

Appendix E: Reflection Questions

For Part Three: The Four Consequences

1. Think about a recent outcome in your life. Did you get what you wanted, more, less, or the opposite?
2. How did you respond to that outcome? Did you feel victimized, or did you accept it?
3. Can you identify a time when you prepared for only one of the four possible consequences and were disappointed?

For Part Four: The Victim of Expectation

4. What expectations are you currently holding that may be causing you pain?
5. The speaker says, "We are not victims of our choices. We are victims of our expectations." How does this statement apply to your life?
6. How has the "industry of desire" (advertising, social media, etc.) affected your expectations and satisfaction?

For Part Five: Krishna's Teaching

7. What does it mean to "act without attachment to the outcome"? Can you think of a time when you did this?
8. Are you able to "leave it to God" or "leave it to the universe," or do you try to control everything?
9. How can you practice "doing what you have to do" while letting go of the expected result?

Appendix E: Reflection Questions

For Part Six: From Karma to Dharma

1. What are the "five intelligences" in your life? Which one tends to dominate?
2. How can you open to the "sixth and seventh intelligences" — love and surrender?
3. What would it mean to be a "dharma warrior" — acting for the sake of action, not for the outcome?

For Part Seven: The Pandava State

4. What are the three P's — peace, purpose, power — in your life? Rate yourself on a scale of 1-10 for each.
5. What would you do differently if you truly believed that "everything is possible" for you?
6. How can you enter the "all-possibility zone" in your daily life?

For Part Eight: The Conditioned Mind

7. What is an example of a "conditioned" belief you hold that may not be true?
8. Can you think of a situation where the same cause produced different effects in different people (like the snake/fear vs. snake/devotion)?
9. How can you return to your "natural state" — the state of peace, purpose, and power?

For the Epilogue

10. What does it mean to be "professional" in your life?
11. What is the "angle" you need to take in your life to see things differently?
12. What is one action you will take today to move from victim mode to victory mode?

Appendix F: Daily Practices

Morning Ritual

1. Wake up before sunrise.
2. Bathe and cleanse your body.
3. Perform puja or meditation.
4. Read from a sacred text.
5. Set your intention for the day.

The Practice of Peace

1. When you feel your peace being disturbed, take a deep breath.
2. Remind yourself: "I choose peace. I am the creator of my peace."
3. Observe your thoughts without judgment.
4. Let go of what you cannot control.

The Discovery of Purpose

1. Ask yourself: "Why was I born? What is my purpose?"
2. Listen to the answers from within.
3. Do not seek validation from others.
4. Act on your purpose every day.

The Cultivation of Power

1. Take responsibility for your actions.
2. Do not give your power to others.
3. Act with intention and integrity.
4. Trust your inner strength.

The Art of Non-Attachment

1. Act without expecting a specific outcome.
2. Accept whatever comes with equanimity.
3. Let go of your desires and attachments.
4. Trust the universe.

The Discipline of Action

1. Act with intention and purpose.
2. Do not procrastinate.
3. Do your duty without attachment.
4. Act with integrity.

The Surrender of Outcome

1. Do your work and leave the outcome to the universe.
2. Trust that what happens is for the best.
3. Let go of worry and fear.
4. Surrender to God or existence.

Appendix G: Journal Prompts

1. What does Andava mean to me? What does Tandava mean to me?
2. In what areas of my life am I in victim mode? How can I switch to victory mode?
3. Think of a recent outcome. Did I get what I wanted, more, less, or the opposite? How did I respond?
4. What expectations are currently causing me pain? How can I let them go?
5. What would I do if I had no fear of the outcome?
6. Who or what do I believe is more powerful than me? How can I reclaim my power?
7. What is my purpose in life? How can I live it more fully?
8. What conditioned beliefs do I hold that are not serving me?
9. What would it mean to be a "professional" in my life?
10. What is one action I will take today to move from victim to victor?

Appendix H: Meditation Guide

Meditation for Peace

1. Sit comfortably with your back straight.
2. Close your eyes.
3. Take deep, slow breaths.
4. Repeat silently: "I am peaceful. I am calm. I am at peace."
5. Observe any thoughts without judgment.
6. Let go of all worries.
7. Sit for 10-15 minutes.

Meditation for Purpose

1. Sit comfortably with your back straight.
2. Close your eyes.
3. Take deep, slow breaths.
4. Ask yourself: "What is my purpose?"
5. Wait for the answer to arise from within.
6. Accept whatever comes.
7. Sit for 10-15 minutes.

Meditation for Power

1. Sit comfortably with your back straight.
2. Close your eyes.
3. Take deep, slow breaths.
4. Repeat silently: "I am powerful. I am the creator. I am the cause."
5. Feel the power within you.
6. Visualize yourself achieving your goals.
7. Sit for 10-15 minutes.

Appendix I:
The Story of the Naga and the Snake

In Tamil tradition, there is a story about a snake that was both feared and worshipped.

In a village, there lived a snake. The villagers were afraid of it. They ran away from it. They threw stones at it. They tried to kill it. They believed it was dangerous. They believed it would harm them.

But tnefe was an old woman in the village who saw the snake differently. She saw it as Nagaraja — the Serpent Lord. She offered it milk. She prayed to it. She worshipped it. She believed it was sacred. She believed it would bless her.

The snake was the same. The cause was the same. But the effect was different. For most villagers, the effect was fear. For the old woman, the effect was devotion.

The difference was not in the snake.
The difference was in the villagers.
The difference was in their conditioning.
The difference was in their state of mind.
The difference was in their state of being.

This story illustrates the principle of the conditioned mind. The same cause can produce different effects depending on the conditioning of the observer. And by changing our conditioning, we can change our experience of the world.